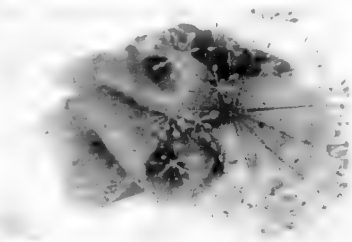
"Someone in the family should have one," was the editorial comment that followed.

And on the topic of irony, several people have noted that the cookbook has become somewhat of a collector's item since Bernie Madoff's arrest in December. It's now worth more than its actual $36 (US) book value. The book can be purchased for $50 (US), and some sites are selling it for as much as $100.



PAUPIETTES OF SMOKED SALMON WITH WALNUT VINAIGRETTE
Chef Michael Hutchings

10 slices of smoked salmon
1 cup diced avocado
1 cucumber diced
1 tsp. tarragon
1/4 lb. mixed baby lettuces, diced
1 cup diced smoked salmon juice of 1 lemon
1/2 diced tomato
salt and white pepper
1/4 cup walnut vinaigrette (recipe follows)

Make the salad with all the ingredients and season well with salt, pepper, tarragon and lemon juice.

Take each slice of salmon and fold it around the salad mixture and form it into little pillows. Place on a serving plate and drizzle lightly with walnut vinaigrette. Remaining walnut vinaigrette can be used later as salad dressing. Makes 10 servings.

Walnut Vinaigrette
1 tbsp. Dijon mustard
2 cups walnut oil
1/2 cup vinegar ground white pepper
salt to taste

Combine all ingredients in a blender. Pulse 10-seconds to combine. Store in the refrigerator.

BUCKWHEAT RISOTTO WITH WILD LEEKS AND GOAT CHEESE
Chef Anne Rosenzweig

4 tbsp. unsalted butter
1 tsp. garlic chopped
1 cup dry orzo
1/2 cup crumbled goat cheese
4 tbsp. parsley, chopped
1 cup wild leeks (regular leeks can be substituted)
1 cup cooked buckwheat (kasha)
1 1/2 cups vegetable stock or broth, as needed
1/2 cup chiffonade of Swiss chard (or very finely chopped)
4 tbsp. chives, chopped

Heat medium saucepan over moderate heat. Add 2 tbsp. butter and let sizzle. Then stir in leeks and garlic. Cook 2 minutes.

Add buckwheat groats, orzo and 1/2 cup stock and cook slowly until stock is absorbed. Orzo should be al dente. Stir in goat cheese, Swiss chard, parsley, chives, remaining butter, and salt and pepper to taste. Cook until pasta is creamy and luxuriant. Serve immediately. Makes 4 servings.

Recipes from the far corners of the world

It may not be your bubbie's brisket, but leek frittatas from Turkey and cornflour-coconut halvah from India are the very dishes that will make your Rosh Hashanah meal unforgettable. The American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC), operating in more than 70 countries around the globe, has collected from some of the most exotic locales in Jewish life a menu of decadent recipes for the Jewish New Year.

Hailing from Jewish families the world over, these recipes will connect you to traditions and tastes thousands of years old. And, as with all Jewish cooking, some of the recipes play fast and loose with ingredient amounts and cooking time, so channel your inner Joan Nathan, and get cooking! Bon appetit!

FRITADA DE PRASA (LEEK FRITTATA)

This recipe from Turkey is courtesy of Lina Eskinazi, Nükhet Franco, Ester Antebi, Jinet Sidi-Sarfati, Sara Enriquez, and Ora Gürkan, authors of Izmir Sephardic Cuisine, which will soon be published in English.

2 lb. leeks
4 eggs
2 slices of thick, stale bread, crumbled (or 2 boiled and mashed potatoes)
3 tbsp. vegetable oil
salt to taste
black pepper to taste

Note: Frittatas are generally made without cheese. If desired, 1 cup of grated tulum cheese can be added. Tulum is a regional cheese, and if it's not available, you can use feta.

Wash leeks and cut into small pieces and boil in water for 10 minutes until tender. Drain and squeeze out excess water.

Beat the eggs and mix them with the leeks, salt, pepper and breadcrumbs (or mashed potatoes). Heat oil in a 12-in. pan. Pour the mixture into the pan. Bake in preheated oven at about 390 for 40 minutes.

CORNFLOUR-COCONUT HALAVA (A SPECIALTY OF THE BENE ISRAEL COMMUNITY)

Recipe courtesy of Rosy Solomon Moses of Mumbai, India.

2 cups cornstarch (in India, use corn flour)
A drop or two of pink, orange or red food colouring
2 cups of sugar
4 tbsp. chopped almonds and pistachios
1 medium-sized coconut (or 1 can of thick coconut milk)
pinch of salt
1 tbsp. margarine
1/4 tsp. each of cardamom and nutmeg.

Scrape coconut, grind in the mixer and extract coconut milk with warm water to measure 2 quarts. Sieve cornstarch and add to the coconut milk with sugar, a good pinch of salt and colour.

Mix well and pour into a stove-top pan and cook on low flame, stirring all the time to prevent sticking. Stir for about 30 minutes.

Pour a little into a plate, and if it does not stick to the plate, add the margarine, half the nuts, the cardamom and nutmeg powder. Mix well and pour onto 2 ungreased trays, 8 x 10 inches. Tilt to spread evenly. Sprinkle on remaining nuts. Cool and cut into squares or diamonds. Keep overnight in the fridge if not consumed the same day.

Optional: You may want to add 1 packet of agar agar (a gelatin agent) in 1/4 cup of warm water and cook for 5 minutes more, before adding the margarine and nuts, for firmness.

The following two recipes from Israel are courtesy of Ayala Yasu, an Ethiopian-Israeli, who in 1984 flew to Israel with Operation Moses.

LENTIL SPREAD

2 cups red lentils
3 tbsp. oil
2 medium onions, diced into cubes
2 cloves garlic, crushed
1 cup boiling water
1 tsp. hot paprika
1 1/2 tbsp. sweet paprika
1 tbsp. chicken soup
salt to taste
turmeric to taste (optional)

Cook the lentils until soft. Sauté onions and garlic in oil in a separate pan until soft. Add hot and sweet paprika and water and simmer on low flame for five minutes.

Add cooked lentils and chicken soup. Add salt and turmeric to taste.

DABO

2 lb. flour
2 tbsp. yeast
1/4 tsp. salt
3 1/2 cups lukewarm water

Combine all ingredients and allow dough to rise about 1-1/2 hours. Place dough in a large pan and bake at 325 until golden.

Note that Dabo can also be "baked" in a large pot over a very low flame. Once the dough appears dry, remove it from the pan, and cook on the other side until golden.

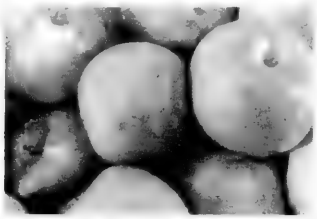
Since 1914, the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee (JDC) has given global expression to the principle that all Jews are responsible for one another. JDC acts on behalf of North America's Jewish communities and others to rescue Jews in danger, provide relief to those in distress, revitalize overseas Jewish communities and help Israel overcome the social challenges of its most vulnerable citizens. JDC also provides nonsectarian emergency relief and long-term development assistance worldwide. For more information, please visit www.jdc.org.

Desserts for Rosh Hashanah

By SYBIL KAPLAN
Special to The CJN

Dipping the apple in honey on Rosh Hashanah is said to symbolize the desire for a sweet new year. In Bereshit, the book of Genesis, Israel compares the fragrance of his son, Jacob, to sadeh shel tappuchim, a field of apple trees.

Scholars tell us that mystical powers were ascribed to the apple and people believed it provided good health and personal well being.



Some attribute the using of an apple to the translation of the story of Adam and Eve and the forbidden fruit which caused the expulsion from paradise.

Some maintain in the phrase "go you way, eat the fat, drink the sweet," that sweet refers to apples and honey.

POACHED APPLE SAUCE

1 1/2 lb. apples
4 cups water
1 cup sugar
2 vanilla beans
1/3 cup lemon juice
3 tbsp. confectioners' sugar (optional)
2 tbsp. flavoured brandy or 2 tbsp. liqueur

Halve apples and remove cores. In a saucepan, place water, sugar and vanilla beans. Stir until sugar dissolves. Add lemon juice and apples. Cook until apples are tender. Add confectioners' sugar, cool and chill.

Puree fruit in processor or blender with some of poaching syrup. Add brandy or liqueur.

APPLESAUCE CAKE

1 2 cup butter or margarine
1 2 cup sugar
3/4 cup brown sugar
2 eggs
2 tsp. vanilla
2 1/4 cups flour
1 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
1/4 tsp. allspice
1 1/4 cups unsweetened applesauce
1 cup raisins
1/3 cup rum

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a bundt or tube pan. In a food processor or mixer, blend margarine, sugars, eggs and vanilla. Add flour, baking soda, cinnamon, allspice and applesauce. Blend. Add raisins and rum. Spoon batter into pan. Bake in preheated 350-degree oven 50 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into the centre comes out clean.

SUGAR-FREE APPLESAUCE CUPCAKES

This recipe is fun to use for fancy cupcake pans or mini pans.

1 1/4 cups vegetable oil
4 eggs
1 3/4 cups sugar substitute
2 cups flour
2 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 tsp. cinnamon
2 cups cooked unsweetened applesauce
2 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Grease muffin tins. In a mixer or food processor, combine oil, eggs and sugar substitute.

Add flour, baking soda, cinnamon, applesauce and vanilla and blend. Spoon into greased muffin tins. Bake in preheated 350 degree oven for 25 minutes or until a toothpick inserted into a couple of muffins comes out clean.

Holiday Food Ideas

Food is often a symbol of our religion

By DENISE PHILLIPS
Special to The CJN

Food is, of course, central to Jewish life, but its role is to nourish us, not only from a nutritional point of view, but also from a spiritual and religious one. Many of our festivals are now instantly associated with certain types of dishes for example, cheesecake on Shavuot or apple cake on Rosh Hashanah. But what is the source of these symbolic links and how have they evolved?

The Torah itself contains no recipes, and food is rarely mentioned except in the context of the dietary laws and sacrifices. However, subsequent generations of Jews have created powerful and highly symbolic links to food, in order to assist with the celebration of key events.

In addition, the Gemara does discuss specific foods that it says are symbolic of a positive good attribute or have names that are linked to or sound similar to words that indicate some sort of good fortune.

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, I have chosen some foods with interesting symbolic connections to the festival for us to consider as we pray for and look forward to a new year full of health and prosperity.

Honey has an obvious link to the festival because of our desire for a sweet year, but there is a deeper, more meaningful link. In gematriah, the numerical value of the Hebrew word for honey is 306, and our sages link this to the number of the opening words in one of the main prayers said at this season: Av Harachamim – Father of Mercy.

In addition to eating honey cake, it is also customary, when making Hamotzi to dip the challah into the honey. I tend to go one step further and actually make the challah with honey for added sweetness and flavour.

One of the other common practices at Rosh Hashanah is to dip a piece of apple into honey. In Genesis, Jacob went to his elderly, blind father, Isaac, and claimed the birthright that was due to his older twin, Esau. Esau was a hunter and a "man of the field," and on the instructions of his loving mother, Rebecca, Jacob dressed up in Esau's hunting clothes. This was noted by Isaac, who commented that his son smelled like a field which HaShem had blessed, and went on to bless Jacob with wealth and power. Some commentators say that the "field, which HaShem has blessed" refers to an apple orchard, and the smell of that orchard was the smell of the Garden of Eden.

It is therefore fitting to eat an apple, a fruit whose smell is associated with the blessings of Jacob (and according to the Vilna Gaon, these were given on what is now Rosh Hashanah), as well as with the Garden of Eden, on the day on which we ourselves want blessings.

There are other less well-known symbolic foods.

Pumpkin or gourds have thick skins, and when we eat them or food made from them, we are expressing the hope that as this vegetable has been protected by a thick skin, God will protect us and gird us with strength.

Black-eyed peas: the Aramaic name for black-eyed peas, rubiya or lubiya, sounds similar to the Hebrew word "rabah," which means to increase, and we therefore wish to increase our good deeds in the coming year.

Leeks in Hebrew are karti, a word that means to cut, and at Rosh Hashanah time, we wish that our enemies will be cut down.

Combine food with tradition

Carrots: in Yiddish, the word for carrots is mehren, which also means "to increase." For this reason, it has become the custom in many communities to eat carrots at the start of the New Year, in order to wish for a good and prosperous start.

We therefore say a Yehi Ratzon prayer that contains the request, "May... our merits increase."

Pomegranates: it is claimed that the pomegranate contains 613 seeds. This is the same as the number of commandments in the Torah, although I have never had the patience to check this myself! It is also symbolic that everyone has some goodness inside them, and as we look inside a pomegranate, even though there may be some bad seeds, there are still some good ones, just as there is always some goodness inside of every person.

Fish is another example of a food eaten for prosperity and growth, so that we should multiply as a people and be as plentiful as the fish in the sea.

A fish head or sheep's head is placed on the table in some traditions, but not eaten! It is again symbolic that on Rosh Hashanah, we should be seen as the "head" and not the "tail" among the nations. This is based on a verse in Deuteronomy, which reads, "And HaShem shall place you as a head and not a tail." The sheep's head is also a reminder of the story of the binding of Isaac, in which Isaac's father, Abraham, is instructed to offer a ram in place of Isaac. We read this story on the second day of Rosh Hashanah.

HONEY APPLE CAKE

One of the many traditions at Rosh Hashanah is to dip sliced apples into honey in the hope that the forthcoming year will be filled with sweetness. I decided that I would combine these two ingredients in a delicious cake that is ideal for both tea and dessert. The result is a cake that is subtly spiced and mouth-wateringly sweet. I also bake this in a round pan, symbolic of the hoped-for fullness in the New Year. This cake can be served not only on Rosh Hashanah but during the rest of the year as well.

I have used orange blossom honey which is my favourite; this honey has exceptional taste and is great used in tea, spread on breads or biscuits, and any way you choose to use it – a great all-round honey! Orange blossom honey is often a combination of citrus sources, usually light in colour and mild in flavour with a fresh scent and light citrus taste. Orange blossom honey is produced in Florida, Southern California and parts of Texas.

1 1/2 cups orange blossom honey
1/4 cup apple juice
1 large orange – zest and juice
3 large eggs
1/4 cup vegetable oil
1/2 cup strong coffee
3 cups all-purpose flour
1 tsp. baking soda
2 tsp. baking powder
2 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 cup raisins
2 apples – peeled and roughly chopped

Grease and line a 10-in. round cake pan with non-stick parchment paper. Preheat the oven to 350.

Whisk together the honey, apple juice, zest and juice of 1 orange, vegetable oil, coffee and eggs.

Place all the dry ingredients – flour, baking soda, baking powder and cinnamon – in a separate bowl and then gradually add to the wet ingredients.

Stir in the chopped apple and raisins. Bake for 1 hour and 15 minutes or until set in the centre. Serves 8-10 people. Cake can be frozen.

To serve the stylish way: Invert the cake onto a plate and dust with confectioners' sugar.

Holiday Food Ideas

Cook ahead and enjoy the holiday

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special to The CJN

"All seven days of the festival, each one should turn the hut into his permanent residence, and his house into the temporary one" (Sukkah 2, 9)

Of all the family-oriented holidays on the Jewish calendar, Sukkot, which entails setting up a temporary house, is probably the most family-oriented of all. There's nothing more inviting than a sukkah whose walls are decorated with fruits and vegetables as well as our children's artwork and handicrafts rather than expensive artwork. However, in honour of the chag it is incumbent upon us to use our nicest tableware.

Sukkot follows quickly after Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur. Thus, there is a lot of holiday cooking and guest entertaining in a short amount of time. I like to prepare as many dishes ahead of time and refrigerate or freeze them so that I don't spend my whole holiday in the kitchen. Being that it is also a harvest festival our menus typically include dishes with plenty of fresh fruits and vegetables

This menu includes special Sukkot recipes that are quick to prepare and easy to serve in a sukkah.

ROAST CHICKEN WITH DRIED FRUIT AND ALMONDS

This dish, based on one from Bon Apetit magazine can be made the day ahead and refrigerated. Prepare the onion fruit mixture the day before and refrigerate to make it easier on the day of cooking.

7 tbsp. olive oil, divided
3 lb. onions, thinly sliced
1 lb. pitted prunes, halved
12 oz. pitted dates, halved
10 oz. dried apricot halves (about 2 cups)
3 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. ground cinnamon
2 (4- to 4 1/2-lb.) chickens, rinsed, patted dry
1 tsp. turmeric, divided
1 1/2 cups (or more) water
1/2 cup blanched slivered almonds, toasted

Heat 6 tbsp. olive oil in heavy large skillet over medium-high heat. Add onions and sauté until deep golden brown, about 30 minutes; sprinkle with salt and pepper. Transfer onions to large bowl; mix in prunes, dates, apricots, sugar, and cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Line large roasting pan with parchment paper and spread fruit mixture over the bottom. Tuck chicken wing tips under or tie them. Rub each chicken with 1/2 tbsp. remaining olive oil and 1/2 tsp. turmeric. Sprinkle each with salt and pepper. place chickens, side by side, atop fruit mixture. Pour 1 1/2 cups water around chickens. Roast chickens 1 hour. Turn pan around; add more water to fruit mixture by 1/4 cupfuls if beginning to dry. Continue to roast chickens until brown and juices run clear when thigh is pierced, about 45 minutes.

Transfer chickens to carving board; let stand 10 minutes. Spoon fruit onto platter; top with chickens and any accumulated juices. Sprinkle with almonds and serve. (Makes 8 -10 servings)

'UNSTUFFED' CABBAGE

Stuffed cabbage is a traditional Sukkot dish. I like this simpler version which can be made ahead and frozen. It can also be made in a crock pot.

Adjust the sauce ingredients to taste depending on your preference for piquant or sweet tasting stuffed cabbage.

1 1/2 lb. lean ground beef
1/4 cups water
2 eggs
2 tbsp. dried minced onions; divided
1/2 cup rice; when raw, cooked
1/4 cup brown sugar; to taste
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1/2 tsp. freshly ground pepper
28 oz. whole peeled tomatoes
6 oz .tomato paste
1/2 cup vinegar or lemon juice
6 ginger snaps or fresh or dried ginger to taste
1 medium head cabbage

In a large skillet brown the ground beef; add water, eggs, rice, 2 tsp. dried minced onion, salt and pepper and mix thoroughly.

In a large bowl, combine tomatoes, tomato paste, rest of dried minced onions, vinegar or lemon juice and brown sugar to taste. Cut the tomatoes into chunks and stir it into the sauce until well mixed. Add the ginger snaps (crumbled) and stir. Taste and correct for flavour; should be sweet and sour. Set aside.

Core the cabbage and shred. Place half of the cabbage on the bottom of a shallow casserole which has a tight-fitting lid. Cover the cabbage with half the tomato mixture. Arrange the meat mixture on top and cover with remaining cabbage. Top with the remaining tomato mixture. Cover tightly with foil and place the lid on top.

Bake at 325 for one hour. Reduce heat to 250 and bake for two more hours.

At this point, the casserole may be cooled, wrapped and frozen. For the best taste, remove casserole from the oven, cool and refrigerate overnight. The next day, let the casserole come to room temperature and then bake, uncovered, at 300 for 45 minutes. If the casserole is to be eaten the same day, remove the lid for at least 45 minutes of the two-hour baking time.

When you serve a portion, make certain you dig down deep to get all the layers of the recipe. (Makes 8 servings)

APPLE PIE CAKE

1 21-oz. can apple pie filling
2 cups all-purpose flour
1 1/2 cups sugar
1/4 cup vegetable oil
2 large eggs
2 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla extract
2 tsp. cinnamon
1 tsp. nutmeg
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. ground cloves
1 cup chopped walnuts

Preheat oven to 350. Generously grease and lightly flour a 9- or 10-in. fluted tube pan.

In a large mixer bowl, at low speed, beat pie filling, flour, sugar, oil, eggs, soda, vanilla, cinnamon, nutmeg, salt, and cloves for 30 seconds. At medium speed, beat for 3 minutes, scraping bowl occasionally. Stir in nuts. Pour into pan.

Bake for 1 hour or until a wooden pick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cool upright in pan on a wire rack for 2 hours or until completely cooled. Remove from pan and serve.

HOT FRUIT CASSEROLE

Easy to make, this recipe can be halved but leftovers keep well.

1 28-oz. can peach halves
1 28-oz. can peach slices
1 15 1/4-oz. can pineapple chunks
1 17-oz. can apricot halves
1 28-oz. can pear halves
1 17-oz. can pitted dark cherries
1 17-oz. can figs packed in light syrup or 6 fresh figs
6 dozen almond macaroons, or other coconut cookies
3-4 bananas lemon juice
brown sugar
butter
2 2-oz. packages slivered almonds
2/3 cup banana liqueur or Cointreau

Drain fruit. Dry and crumble macaroons. The day of serving, slice bananas and sprinkle with lemon juice to keep from turning brown. Mix all fruits together. Layer macaroons and fruits in two 2-quart casseroles. Sprinkle liberally with brown sugar and dot with butter. Sprinkle almonds on top. Pour liqueur over top. Bake at 300 for 20-30 minutes. Makes 12-14 servings.

Sweet endings to a holiday meal

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

Holiday time can be stressful, and what to serve for meals plays a part in that stress.

One thing for certain, dessert is always on the menu. I have, over the past few years, changed some of the main course selections to fish and vegetarian entrees just so that I can whip up a few of the following dairy desserts that I can only justify making when I have company.

Of course they can be made at any time of year but they do take a little more effort and have a few more calories.

Note: several of the recipes can be made pareve if you're serving meat.

6 LAYER TOFFEE TORT

2 2/3 cups flour
2 cups sugar
1 cup margarine or butter - soft
1 cup buttermilk
3/4 cup cocoa
2 tsp. baking soda
1 1/2 tsp. vanilla
1/4 tsp. salt
2 large eggs
1 cup coffee – hot
1 3/8 oz. heath bars
2 cups whipping cream
3 tbsp. brown sugar
1 2 tsp. instant coffee
1 tsp. water – hot

Preheat oven to 350. Grease and flour 3, 8 in. cake pans. In large bowl, combine flour, sugar, margarine, buttermilk, cocoa, baking soda, vanilla, salt and eggs. With mixer on low, beat just until mixed, scraping sides with spatula. Add coffee to bowl. Increase speed to medium; beat 2 minutes. Pour batter into pans. Bake 25-30 minutes. Cool cake in pans on racks, 10 minutes. Remove from pans and cool completely. While cake is cooling, chop Heath bars. Reserve 2/3 of the Heath bar. In a cup, dissolve 1/2 tsp instant coffee with 1 tsp hot water. Cool. With serrated knife, cut each cake in two, making 6 thin layers. In a bowl, beat whipping cream, brown sugar and cooled 1 tsp of coffee until stiff peaks form. To assemble cake, place 1 layer on plate; spread with 1/2 cup whipped cream.

Sprinkle with 1/5 of the remaining Heath bar. Repeat layers 4 more times. Top with last layer of cake. Thinly spread whipped cream over top and sides of cake. Gently press reserved 2/3 of the Heaths onto top and sides of cake. Refrigerate until ready to serve.

MERINGUE BERRY ROLLS

4 egg whites, room temp.
3/4 cup sugar
1/4 tsp. cream of tartar
1 tsp. cornstarch
3/4 cup heavy whipping cream or non dairy whipped topping
1 1/2 cups assorted berries (diced strawberries and whole blueberries)

Preheat oven to 350. Beat egg whites until frothy. Continue to beat and gradually add sugar. Beat until soft peaks form, then beat in cream of tartar and cornstarch. Continue beating until stiff peaks form. Line a 9x13 in. baking sheet with waxed paper. Spread the meringue evenly over the paper and bake for 12-15 min. until lightly browned. Cool completely. Invert the meringue onto the work surface on another sheet of waxed paper. Carefully peel off the first sheet of waxed paper.

Beat the whipping cream until stiff. Spread the whipped cream (or non dairy equivalent) evenly over the meringue. Place the berries over the whipped cream. Beginning at one long edge and using the sheet of waxed paper as a guide, roll the meringue over the berries, jelly-roll style. Transfer to a serving platter. Garnish with additional berries and mint leaves if desired. Cut into 2 in. slices and serve. Serves 6.

CARAMEL GLAZED APPLE CAKE

1 1/2 cups butter or margarine, at room temperature, plus more for the pan
1 cup sugar
1 cup light brown sugar
3 eggs
3 cups flour, plus more for the pan
1 tsp. baking soda
3 tsp. ground cinnamon
1/2 tsp. freshly grated nutmeg
1/2 tsp. kosher salt
5 Granny Smith apples, peeled, cored, and cut into a 1/2-inch dice
1 1/4 cups coarsely chopped pecans
2 1/4 tsp. vanilla extract
store bought caramel ice cream topping, warmed in microwave vanilla ice cream (optional)

Heat oven to 325. Grease and flour a 9X13 baking pan and set it aside. In a large bowl, using an electric mixer beat the butter and the white and brown sugars until light and fluffy, 3 to 5 minutes. Add the eggs, one at a time, beating after each addition.

In another bowl, combine the flour, baking soda, cinnamon, nutmeg, and salt. Using a wooden spoon, gradually add the flour mixture to the egg mixture. The batter should be very thick. Stir in the apples, pecans, and vanilla. Scrape the batter into the prepared baking pan. Bake until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean, 50 to 60 minutes. Transfer to a wire rack. Let cool for at least 10 minutes while you heat the caramel glaze, if using.

With a spatula, loosen the sides of the cake. If you want to remove it from the pan, invert it onto a baking sheet, then invert it again, right-side up, onto a platter. With a toothpick or fork, poke holes all over the surface. Pour on the warm sauce. Serve warm or at room temperature, with ice cream, if desired. Serves 10 to 12.

On Campus

Task force urges better enforcement of school policies

Another recommendation by the task force was to amend York's Student Code of Conduct to include certain student rights and to rename it the Student Code of Rights and Responsibilities (SCRR).

"The SCRR should recognize fundamental student rights including: the right to free expression, association and mobility on campus; the right to participate in all university activities free of harassment, disruption, intimidation or discrimination on prohibited grounds and a procedure to enforce such rights when violated," the report said.

The report gave a lot of attention to the issue of security, including the recommendation that York security guards be given the authority to serve notices of violation of school rules on the spot.

For example, it said that if students haven't followed proper booking procedures or are using a space without permission from the administration, York security should be able to demand that the activity cease and, if it continues, serve a notice of violation.

The notice and a report should be filed with the appropriate office, the report said, adding that the same procedure could be followed if students are found to be in violation of the SCRR.

With respect to "non-community members," or non-students, the report said they should be restricted from campus if they violate university regulations through a written warning, and "if there is a failure to comply, restrictions on access to on-campus events through the use of the Trespass to Property Act [should be given]. We note that demonstrations by non-York community members should not be permitted on the York campus."

The task force suggested that if these measures aren't enough to address the issue of the proper enforcement of university policies, York should consider appointing special constables under the Police Services Act. (Special constables, such as those employed at U of T, have the authority of a police officer within a defined territory.)

In response to the task force report, the commission on the Quality of Life for Jewish Students at York University – formed last May by Hillel of Greater Toronto, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), and Hasbara @ York to address concerns about anti-Israel and anti-Jewish incidents at York – released a statement that called it "a step in the right direction."

Matan Hazanov, president of Hillel at York, said he plans to "work closely with York University to ensure that Jewish students remain a vital partner in making York campus a better place for all students."

Elyse Lackie, the commission's chair, added that the report addressed many of the concerns outlined in its submission to the task force in June.

"We hope for even greater strides by the university towards the creation of a more civil and respectful campus environment," she said.

UJA Federation spokesperson and commission member Howard English said in an interview with The CJN that he was "really pleased" that the task force adopted some of the commission's recommendations, such as the suggestion to give York security the authority to provide instant citations for violations of the student code and to consider the appointment of special constables.

"We also expressed concern in our report about trespassers on university property who come to the university with the purpose of instigation and the task force took a strong stand against those non-students," English said.

But while English said the members of the commission feel "that the task force… heard the concerns of the Jewish community," he noted that the report didn't "specifically mention the impact of events on Jewish students."

Hasbara @ York and Hasbara Fellowships released a statement that commended the task force for its recommendations, but they expressed reservations about "several noticeable omissions."

For example, the report refers to the Feb. 11 incident at the Hillel lounge, during which Jewish students were trapped inside while other students chanted anti-Israel slogans, but it didn't specify that the attack occurred at Hillel or that Jewish students were the victims.

Hasbara also took issue with the fact that it wasn't consulted by the task force, while Students Against Israeli Apartheid was. B'nai Brith also released a statement that was critical of the task force for failing to specify that Jewish students were intimidated and faced anti-Semitism on numerous occasions.

Monahan, who said the goal is to move ahead as quickly as possible to put the recommendations into practice, said he's looking forward to a better year at York.

"We had a really challenging year this past year… and I think we're looking forward to a good year and looking forward to students coming back on campus and working constructively for our students. Things are on the upswing at York for all our students," Monahan said.

Jennifer Diamond, right, poses for a picture in 2007 with the late Ted Kennedy, during her internship with the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions Committee that Kennedy chaired.

Hillel staff member recalls 'my senator'

By JENNIFER DIAMOND
Special to The CJN

Much has been said about Ted Kennedy since his passing. He will forever be remembered as a staunch liberal and proponent of change.

His legacy will be in the legislation he helped pass, the lives he changed and the bi-partisan bridges he built. But for me, I will always remember him as "my senator."

As a senior at the University of Maryland, I had the pleasure of interning on the Health, Education, Labor and Pensions (HELP) Committee, of which Ted Kennedy was chair.

It was a tremendous opportunity to work for someone so committed and respected. Senator Kennedy's passion and dedication, despite having done it for so long, taught me tremendous lessons.

Senator Kennedy was truly the captain of the ship. The internship was my first true experience seeing people work because they were dedicated to something larger than themselves.

The long, arduous hours didn't seem to matter – the end result would all be worth it.

Senator Kennedy taught me to find a cause or causes you believe in and work tirelessly for them.

And so, as I approached graduation I realized that despite my major, the Jewish community was the issue I was most passionate about. Specifically, I cared about Israel and its image in the world.

When I moved to Toronto last year I was privileged to have the opportunity to work for Hillel of Greater Toronto.

In many ways, I have carried the lessons I learned working for the senator into my work.

Senator Kennedy knew his stance on issues and his convictions were strong, though he was always respectful and tried to reach across partisan lines.

In the same way, our commitment and convictions to Israel are strong while at the same time trying to build bridges with others and find points of commonality.

I remember one day in particular when Senator Kennedy took time out of his busy schedule and invited the interns that worked in his various committees and offices to meet with him.

It felt special that he wanted to hear from us about how our experience was. But I was most impressed that he wanted to hear our questions and impressions – he wanted to know what we thought about the issues on the floor, the work we were involved in.

He used us a gauge to see what young people thought and what most concerned them.

In this way, I learned that no matter how much you think you know, there is much to be gained by active listening. The students that I have interacted and worked with on a daily basis have taught me more than I could ever teach them.

Senator Kennedy taught me the lesson of empowerment by giving me the opportunity to ask him questions, and his staff empowered me by giving me the responsibilities I had in preparing briefing books, charts and information for the senator.

In the same vein, in my work at Hillel I have had the opportunity to empower students to propel their campus community forward, to help them find the issues they are passionate about and pursue them.

I will be forever indebted to Senator Kennedy for teaching me what leadership is about. I can only hope that through my work with the Jewish community I can do the same for Jewish students who are our future leadership.

Jennifer Diamond is Hillel of Greater Toronto's assistant director, Israel affairs.

Actors in a tiff over Tel Aviv spotlight at film fest

"We do not protest the individual Israeli filmmakers included in City to City, nor do we in any way suggest that Israeli films should be unwelcome at TIFF," the protest letter said.

"However, especially in the wake of this year's brutal assault on Gaza, we object to the use of such an important international festival in staging a propaganda campaign on behalf of... an apartheid regime."

The signatories said they plan to hold a press conference on Sept. 10 in Toronto, the opening day of the festival.

A week earlier, on Aug. 27, Greyson, a York University film professor who is a director of gay-themed movies and a supporter of Queers Against Israeli Apartheid, withdrew his film, Covered, from the festival, which runs from Sept. 10 to 19.

In a letter addressed to the festival co-directors, Greyson said that "this isn't the right year to celebrate Brand Israel, or to demonstrate an ostrich-like indifference to the realities (cinematic and otherwise) of the region, or to pointedly ignore the international economic boycott campaign against Israel."

He added that by ignoring the Palestinian-led boycott, divestment and sanctions movement against Israel, "TIFF has emphatically taken sides – and in the process, forced every filmmaker and audience member who opposes the occupation to cross a type of picket line."

Greyson, who said he's helping to organize a screening in September for the Toronto Palestinian Film Festival, insisted that he was not protesting Israeli films or filmmakers.

"My protest is against the Spotlight itself, and the smug business-as-usual aura it promotes of a 'vibrant metropolis [and] dynamic young city... commemorating it's centennial,'" Greyson said, citing a quote from a release that TIFF co-director and City to City programmer Cameron Bailey wrote in June.

In response to Greyson, Bailey wrote an open letter in which he insisted that his decision to focus on Tel Aviv was based on the quality of films being produced and that "the City to City series was conceived and curated entirely independently.

"There was no pressure from any outside source. Contrary to rumours or mistaken media reports, this focus is a product only of TIFF's programming decisions. We value that independence and would never compromise it," Bailey said.

He added that in addition to Israeli films, the festival will also include films by Palestinian, Lebanese and Egyptian filmmakers that "address the past history and current realities of the region.

"John writes that his protest isn't against the films or filmmakers we have chosen, but against the spotlight itself. By that reasoning, no films programmed within this series would have met his approval, no matter what they contained. For us, the content and form of films does matter," Bailey said.

"We recognize that Tel Aviv is not a simple choice and that the city remains contested ground... As a festival that values debate and the exchange of cultures, we will continue to screen the best films we can find from around the world," he added.

The films to be shown as part of the series are Kirot by Danny Lerner, Phobidilia by Yoav and Doron Paz, Bena by Niv Klainer, Jaffa by Keren Yedaya, The Bubble by Eytan Fox, A History of Israeli Cinema, Part I and II, by Raphael Nadjari, Life According to Agfa by Assi Dayan, Big Eyes by Uri Zohar, and Big Dig, by Ephraim Kishon.

In a statement, filmmaker Robert Lantos applauded TIFF organizers for refusing "to cater to the agenda of biased individuals with an axe to grind."

Lantos added that, ironically, Israel is the only state in the Middle East where a gay-positive film such as Greyson's Covered could be produced and freely shown.

"In a part of the world ruled by intolerant, autocratic regimes who take a dim view of gender equality, alternative lifestyles and freedom of artistic expression, Israel stands tall as the nation where these fundamental liberties are protected and held sacred. Greyson's hypocrisy is mind-boggling," Lantos said.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chair David Koschitsky circulated an e-mail last week that called on members of the community to "counter the boycott by attending the films that are part of the City to City spotlight on Tel Aviv and to encourage your friends of all cultural backgrounds to do the same."

He added that the Jewish community has "consistently shown our strong and determined support for Israel through a sell-out of Israeli wines at the LCBO last spring and, most recently, by purchasing tickets en masse for the Dead Sea Scrolls exhibition at the [Royal Ontario Museum]. Together, we can tell the true story of Israel as a vibrant democracy."

Federal cabinet minister denounces Hamas, Hezbollah as 'anti-Semitic'

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Federation CJA president Marc Gold, left, greets federal cabinet minister Jason Kenney, as Quebec Jewish Congress president Adam Atlas looks on.

MONTREAL — Federal cabinet minister Jason Kenney says he supports Israel's right to use military force when attacked by terrorists.

At a recent press conference at Federation CJA, he said defending itself was the "responsible thing for Israel to do" when Hezbollah and Hamas, which he described as "explicitly anti-Semitic," launched missiles against Israeli civilians.

"Hezbollah and Hamas seem to be addicted to violence," he said. "It seems to be a way of life."

In response to questions from Stefan Christoff, an activist with the anti-Israel group Tadamon, Kenney said his government "can't comment on every single tactical position in response to provocative attacks, and we regret the tragic deaths of citizens, whether Canadian or foreign, but that does not change the fact that Hezbollah and Hamas are motivated by a profound anti-Semitism."

Kenney said that rather than securing peace after its 2005 withdrawal from Gaza, Israel was hit with thousands of rockets aimed at its civilians.

"Sovereign states have the right and responsibility to protect their citizens from terrorist attacks," he said.

Christoff, who said he was representing the alternative weekly paper Hour, is a member of Tadamon, which actively promotes the removal of Hezbollah from Canada's terrorist list and the boycott of Israel.

He wanted to know if Canada regretted the deaths of civilians in the conflicts with Hezbollah in Lebanon in 2006 and Hamas in Gaza in late 2008. Christoff noted that eight members of a family of Lebanese origin visiting from Montreal were killed in an Israeli air raid in the earlier conflict.

Christoff also wanted to know if the killing of 1,300 Palestinians in Gaza represented "a measured response" by Israel, quoting Prime Minister Stephen Harper's comment in 2006 about Israel's operations against Hezbollah.

Kenney said the Canadian government remains committed to the Palestinian-Israel peace process and a two-state solution.

Kenney, the minister of citizenship, immigration and multiculturalism, had called the press conference to announce funding totaling $223,000 to 10 Jewish institutions to improve their security.

Wiesel urges young not to be indifferent to suffering

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — More than 2,000 people turned up at the St. Denis Theatre Sept. 2 to hear Elie Wiesel impart wisdom directed mainly at young people.

The free public lecture was in the spirit of interfaith understanding, with Rabbi Reuben Poupko of Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation and Father John Walsh of the Roman Catholic St. John Brébeuf Parish acting as MCs.

The main message of the Nobel Peace Prize winner and icon of the Holocaust's speech was do not be bitter, listen to everyone and, above all, do not be indifferent to suffering.

Eli Wiesel

Wiesel, who turns 81 this month, said that no matter what hardship life brings, people have a choice to make something positive out of the experience. He said not to fear those who are different, but rather make an effort to learn from them.

Indifference is more harmful than hatred, he said, and cautioned against doing nothing about what is going on in the world, whether far away like the Darfur crisis or closer to home, because of a sense of powerless.

In a rambling address sprinkled with anecdotes and chassidic tales, Wiesel urged the young to read as much as they can about the Holocaust, especially eyewitness testimony, but not to descend into "morbidity" or "melancholy" as a result.

Although his own books often deal with despair, Wiesel said he hopes readers do not conclude that despair is an end in itself.

Despite the horrors experienced during the Holocaust, horrors that will never leave them, Wiesel said survivors "transcended" it and carried on after the war.

"We had an absolute right to give up on humanity, to say, 'You didn't help us. Leave me alone. Don't speak to me about other people's suffering, I suffered more.'

"But it was just the opposite."

Wiesel was among 400 teens, survivors of Buchenwald, taken to orphanages in France after the war.

"Not one became a social case, not one had anything do with criminality, or was a mental case. Some became doctors, teachers and businessmen, and the businessmen became philanthropists.

"This means we have a choice, and that choice is always ours…We had every reason to give up, but didn't. Nor should you."

On Darfur, he urged students to mobilize and send petitions to their government leaders and the United Nations. Even acting individually can be effective.

Abandoning people is the worst thing you can do, Wiesel said. "Maybe I do not have the remedy … but I can tell them they are not alone, that somebody cares."

That's why his foundation recently bought full page ads in the New York Times and the International Herald Tribune, along with 15 other Nobel laureates, congratulating the young political dissidents in Iran.

"We got such a response [from the dissidents]."

Wiesel also stressed the interconnectedness of humankind. "Whatever happens to a person could happen to another. Whatever happens to the Jewish people almost always affects another. Hitler did not understand that.

"He tried to isolate people: Jews, gypsies, homosexuals, from others." Instead, they took what happened to them and turned it into a sense of responsibility to others.

Jews must "present to the world an open palm, not a fist." But that does not mean losing their identity, he said.

"I can try to attain universality, only as a Jew. I believe the more Jewish I am, the more universal I am."

Wiesel recalled that his family had a maid, an illiterate woman who was a "fervent Christian." During the four weeks they were in the ghetto, she smuggled food in for them, and wanted them to flee before the deportation.

"She argued with my father that she had a hut in the mountains and she would take care of him. But my father said, 'I can't separate myself from the community.'"

Historic Jewish solidarity became dangerous for Jews during the Holocaust, and Hitler realized this, Wiesel said.

"I do not believe Jews or the Jewish religion are superior or inferior to others," and therefore links must be created with others. He affirmed that Jews, Christian and Muslims are "all people of the Book."

Reading, however, may never lead to comprehension, he indicated. "I have read every book on the subject in languages available to me, and I don't understand [the Holocaust or anti-Semitism], even from the enemy's viewpoint."

The lecture was sponsored by the Mike Dym Foundation. Dym, who passed away in 1995, was a Holocaust survivor from Poland who fought heroically with the partisans.

חגיגת מאה שנים לתל אביב

אחד הדברים הטובים ביותר שקרו לי בחיי הוא שלמדתי בבית ספר שבו למדו ילדי עולים מכל מדינות אירופה לצידם של עולי עיראק, מרוקו ומצרים. למדתי לראות את החיים בעיניים ששום ילד צפון תל אביבי לא יראה בחייו, וזה צובע את כל יכולתו להתייחס לאנשים כיום.

מעבר לבחילה שצריכה להתעורר בכל אדם למראה גזענות כל כך בוטה-כשיהודים מגלים גזענות כלפי יהודים אחרים, בעוד הם בוכים על גזענותו של העולם הגדול כלפיהם-זה נשמע כמו מערכון של הגשש. אבל שישאר בינינו.

השר לשעבר בירחי נכנס לכלא לארבע שנים לאחר שבית המשפט העליון החמיר את עונשו המקורי.

יו"ר ש"ס, סגן ראש הממשלה אלי ישי נחלץ לעזרתו וביקש מהנשיא פרס לחנן אותו תוך שהוא אומר: "כאיש ציבור, כבן עדות המזרח וכסגן ראש ממשלה, אני מבור שזו בקשת תגינה שאין מוצדקת ממנה".

בואו נפרוך לרגע את דבריו של הרב לחלקיהם:

"ידידנו"-כאחר הוא ידידנו- מגיע לו שבית המשפט יתעלם מראיות של גניבה ושוחד.

"מרבין תורה ומאדירה"-אבל מתעלם מעשרת הדברות- לא לגנוב, לא תרצח דבר שקר.

"בית משפט מעוות כזה"-בהשוואה כמובן לבתי המשפט הרבניים שמפלים נגד נשים כאילו חיו במאה השלוש עשרה.

"אין להם דת"-לעומת הרב יוסף שיש לו דת והוא שולח לכנסת חברי כנסת שנעבור חמש שש שנים נכנסים לכלא על עבירות פליליות חמורות.

"לא נאמינים בשום דבר"-לעומת הרב יוסף שמאמין שבניחוי הוא מעל לחוק כי הוא מתומכיו.

SHARANSKY SPEAKS AT A MOSCOW SCHOOL

Jewish Agency chairman Natan Sharansky opened the school year for students at the Lipman Jewish Day School in Moscow on Sept. 1 with a class called "the Zionist struggle in the Soviet Union." Speaking to high school students, Sharansky told of his personal story and of the struggle he and others experienced in their efforts to immigrate to Israel. The class was broadcast live to Jewish schools in St. Petersburg, Vilnius in Lithuania, and Kiev in Ukraine. These schools are part of the Hefziba school system, a network of 44 Jewish schools in the former Soviet Union supported by the Jewish Agency and the government of Israel. [Fatima Burnatzeva photo]

Tribunal rules against Internet hate law

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

A human rights tribunal last week ruled that a section of the the Canadian Human Rights Act (CHRA) that imposes quasi-criminal penalties is unconstitutional.

The one-man tribunal, Athanasios Hadjis, said that while web administrator Marc Lemire did promote hatred through an article titled "AIDS Secrets," he would not apply the provisions of the act to him.

Opponents of the CHRA's Section 13, which addresses Internet hate promotion, hailed the decision as a breakthrough, though supporters of the provision say the adjudicator's decision isn't binding and should be appealed.

The decision turned on a 1998 amendment to the CHRA that added penalty provisions to the act. The provisions, Hadjis stated, substantially altered the nature of Section 13 from one that was primarily "conciliatory, preventative and remedial" to one that more closely resembles criminal court remedies.

As a result, an earlier Supreme Court of Canada decision in the John Ross Taylor case could be revisited, he stated.

In that 1990 case, the Supreme Court ruled Section 13 was constitutional even though it violated the Charter guarantee to free expression, because its impact was minimal and, given the benefits in protecting minorities, was warranted in a free and democratic society.

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber said "what the decision has done is confuse everybody."

Two other tribunal judgements recently upheld Section 13. He said the case should be appealed to the Federal Court and perhaps the Supreme Court.

Ezra Levant, author of Shakedown, a critique of human rights commissions, called Hadjis' decision "enormously significant."

The issues were thoroughly debated by phalanxes of lawyers and took years to be resolved. "This is a major treatment of the law" decided by the vice-chair of the Canadian Human Rights Commission (CHRC) tribunal. Though "not technically binding [on other tribunals], it is effectively binding," Levant said.

Furthermore, the judgement shows how the temperament of the commission has changed since the Taylor decision. It has become "aggressive and bullying, entrapping people," Levant said.

The case continued even after Lemire removed the postings in question and agreed to mediation.

"They [the CHRC] refused," Levant said. "They wanted to grind him down."

Levant was even more blistering in his critique of Jewish community organizations, which he dubbed "the official Jews."

Congress is making "a strategic error" in calling for an appeal, he said. "You have domino after domino falling" with pressure building in media editorials, legal opinions and even in the commission itself to end Section 13 cases.

"Human rights commissions have been denormalized. They're laughingstocks," he said.

Nevertheless, Jewish organizations continue to push for appeals, in effect calling for the censorship of expression. Jews are coming across "as whiners who want to shut you down, not debate you. Is this the image we want to project to 33 million Canadians, that we're thin-skinned whiners?" Levant asked.

Lauren Kirshner's debut novel takes readers back to 1990s Toronto

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Lauren Kirshner

Lauren Kirshner's debut novel titled Where We Have To Go, about a "scared, smart, terribly vulnerable" 11-year-old girl, has literary critics excited about the young author's future.

Kirshner, 27, a graduate of the University of Toronto's master's program in creative writing, takes readers back to Toronto in the 1990s, where Lucy Bloom struggles to come to terms with her own identity while growing up as the only child of a Jewish couple stuck in an unhappy marriage.

Her father, a failed photographer turned travel agent who never travels, and her mother, an aging, overweight former Bulgarian "first runner-up in the Miss Sophia West Beauty Pageant," separate shortly after Lucy's 11th birthday.

In addition to moving out of her home to live with her mother in a run-down apartment with "shaggy blue carpeting and a cot that pulled out of the wall" with a mattress that was "grey with a few round yellow stains," Lucy is also struggling with her body image, mean girls, maintaining friendships and her self-consciousness around boys.

Despite her challenges, Lucy maintains a strength and sense of humour that keeps the reader pulling for her.

Kirshner said that while Lucy Bloom and her story are total fabrications, there are certain aspects of Lucy's experience that she resonates with.

"I was a kid that felt on the sidelines. I was an observer. I wasn't bullied like Lucy was, but I wasn't the girl who got a partner first when it was time to go on field trips and I always felt like I was on the side. I understand what that feels like," Kirshner, who is the daughter of CJN staff reporter Sheldon Kirshner, said.

She added that she also drew from her experience as a child of the 90s in Toronto, where she was born and raised.

"I guess I was pretty heavily influenced by pop culture in the 90s and that kind of stuff really resonated with me as a kid, so I was really able to call up that stuff most vividly," said Kirshner, who was mentored by Canadian author Margaret Atwood.

"There were certain tangible things like Lite-Brite [a toy] – we never had enough pegs because someone had lost most of the pegs – or like the snap bracelets or the novelty shoelaces... It was such a time of material acquisition, sort of getting lots of stuff, so it felt right to put a lot of pop culture in the book."

Other references to 90s pop culture in the novel include Lucy's infatuation with ALF, the main character on a sitcom that ran until 1990, and actor Charlie Sheen, after whom she named her cat.

The city of Toronto, as it was 15 years ago, plays another important role in the novel.

"I was able to walk and ride my bike around Toronto and see just how much the city has changed in only 15 years, and it was kind of a sad experience because I see a lot of history being eroded," Kirshner said.

"There are condos going up everywhere. There used to be really cool little shops and stores and it's all a part of the underlying theme of the book, which is that our lives are moving on and the things we've cared about and were familiar to us are getting eroded."

Lucy's Jewish identity is mentioned periodically throughout the novel, but doesn't seem to weigh too heavily on her experience.

"Lucy's identity as a Jewish girl... it is more cultural than religious," said Kirshner, who also grew up in a Jewish family in Toronto.

"I think it's fair to say that when we're that young, our social identity is not so much wrapped up in culture and religion, and it is more just searching for any identity we have on an individual level."

Kirshner said what she loves about Lucy is that even when her situation seems bleak and hopeless, she never stops fighting.

"She refuses to be a victim and in any situation she is able to find the humour and really call on the humour. It's not like she passively waits for solutions or to feel better about life. She makes it happen."

She added that thinking about Lucy makes her recall the time she got stuck in a subway car shortly after the 1995 subway crash in Toronto that killed three people.

"The subway that I was on suddenly stopped on the track, and all the lights went out and people were scared. You could just feel this electric energy moving through the subway," she said.

"Suddenly, after about a minute, this man out of the dark just began telling jokes. It was like the most soothing sound in this time of darkness, and all that anxiety in the subway immediately dissipated and we were calm. When the lights went on, we didn't know who told the joke... We all had a sense that this was a kind of gift that we just got.

"From Lucy, just spending two years with her while I wrote the book, I thought that life is serious, but that doesn't mean that everything has to be taken too seriously. There is humour that can be found in hard times and that will be what gets us through sometimes."

Kirshner, who is thrilled with the attention her debut novel is generating, said that Where We Have To Go (McClelland & Stewart) will be translated into German and sold in the Netherlands and Germany.

"It's pretty rare these days, I've been told, because it is a first book and because it takes place in Toronto. I never expected it to go outside of Canada, so it's a really nice surprise."

In addition to the novel, Kirshner has published poems, short fiction, and also wrote a chapter in I Live Here, a "paper documentary" her sister, actress Mia Kirshner, authored and edited.

"It was on the Maquiladora factories in Juarez, Mexico, and this was where thousands of young Mexican women go every year to basically work in these multinational factories and are basically dreaming of making better lives for themselves," Kirshner said.

"Twenty Poems for Claudia is about just one of the hundreds of women who have been raped, tortured and murdered over the past 15 years in the area."

For the rest of the year, Kirshner said she'll be busy promoting her book and working on a second novel.

On Sept. 22, Kirshner will be at the Winnipeg International Writers Festival and nearly a week later, on the 27th, she'll be back in Toronto for the Word on the Street festival.

I understand what that feels like," Kirshner, who is the daughter of CJN staff reporter Sheldon Kirshner, said.

She added that she also drew from her experience as a child of the 90s in Toronto, where she was born and raised.

"I guess I was pretty heavily influenced by pop culture in the 90s and that kind of stuff really resonated with me as a kid, so I was really able to call up that stuff most vividly," said Kirshner, who was mentored by Canadian author Margaret Atwood.

"There were certain tangible things like Lite-Brite [a toy] – we never had enough pegs because someone had lost most of the pegs – or like the snap bracelets or the novelty shoelaces... It was such a time of material acquisition, sort of getting lots of stuff, so it felt right to put a lot of pop culture in the book."

Other references to 90s pop culture in the novel include Lucy's infatuation with ALF, the main character on a sitcom that ran until 1990, and actor Charlie Sheen, after whom she named her cat.

The city of Toronto, as it was 15 years ago, plays another important role in the novel.

"I was able to walk and ride my bike around Toronto and see just how much the city has changed in only 15 years, and it was kind of a sad experience because I see a lot of history being eroded," Kirshner said.

"There are condos going up everywhere. There used to be really cool little shops and stores and it's all a part of the underlying theme of the book, which is that our lives are moving on and the things we've cared about and were familiar to us are getting eroded."

Lucy's Jewish identity is mentioned periodically throughout the novel, but doesn't seem to weigh too heavily on her experience.

"Lucy's identity as a Jewish girl... it is more cultural than religious," said Kirshner, who also grew up in a Jewish family in Toronto.

"I think it's fair to say that when we're that young, our social identity is not so much wrapped up in culture and religion, and it is more just searching for any identity we have on an individual level."

Kirshner said what she loves about Lucy is that even when her situation seems bleak and hopeless, she never stops fighting.

"She refuses to be a victim and in any situation she is able to find the humour and really call on the humour. It's not like she passively waits for solutions or to feel better about life. She makes it happen."

She added that thinking about Lucy makes her recall the time she got stuck in a subway car shortly after the 1995 subway crash in Toronto that killed three people.

"The subway that I was on suddenly stopped on the track, and all the lights went out and people were scared. You could just feel this electric energy moving through the subway," she said.

"Suddenly, after about a minute, this man out of the dark just began telling jokes. It was like the most soothing sound in this time of darkness, and all that anxiety in the subway immediately dissipated and we were calm. When the lights went on, we didn't know who told the joke... We all had a sense that this was a kind of gift that we just got.

"From Lucy, just spending two years with her while I wrote the book, I thought that life is serious, but that doesn't mean that everything has to be taken too seriously. There is humour that can be found in hard times and that will be what gets us through sometimes."

Kirshner, who is thrilled with the attention her debut novel is generating, said that Where We Have To Go (McClelland & Stewart) will be translated into German and sold in the Netherlands and Germany.

"It's pretty rare these days, I've been told, because it is a first book and because it takes place in Toronto. I never expected it to go outside of Canada, so it's a really nice surprise."

In addition to the novel, Kirshner has published poems, short fiction, and also wrote a chapter in I Live Here, a "paper documentary" her sister, actress Mia Kirshner, authored and edited.

"It was on the Maquiladora factories in Juarez, Mexico, and this was where thousands of young Mexican women go every year to basically work in these multinational factories and are basically dreaming of making better lives for themselves," Kirshner said.

"Twenty Poems for Claudia is about just one of the hundreds of women who have been raped, tortured and murdered over the past 15 years in the area."

For the rest of the year, Kirshner said she'll be busy promoting her book and working on a second novel.

On Sept. 22, Kirshner will be at the Winnipeg International Writers Festival and nearly a week later, on the 27th, she'll be back in Toronto for the Word on the Street festival.

Beyond rallies, how you can stop Iran

Opinion

By SHAI FRANKLIN and MICAH HALPERN

Alongside many heads of state and prime ministers, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad will address the annual opening of the United Nations General Assembly later this month in New York. Jews will turn out across the street to raise voices in protest.

Jews have a legitimate concern about Iran. So should everyone else in the world. Iran's nuclear program and ongoing support for terrorism are a threat to most nations.

One of the most effective vehicles for countering Iran is getting non-Jews and non-Americans to take public positions.

The Jewish community can have a substantive, indirect impact on Iran's actions and policies. Here are some of the strategies that could bear fruit if pursued in a co-ordinated and consistent way.

• A concerted non-governmental effort must be launched to enlist non-Jewish allies and experts across Latin America, Africa and Europe, even in China. Such partners can push their governments to take a meaningful stand against Iran. Have them push their governments to publicly honour their commitments to international treaties and UN Security Council resolutions, and to their own laws.

• Solicit governments to issue joint statements reaffirming sanctions and get governments to sign up their neighbours in the movement to pressure Iran. Most immediately, they should support U.S. President Barack Obama if he announces new measures against Iran, which also could help Israel take more risks on the Palestinian track.

• If leaders insist on attending Ahmadinejad's UN address, they should be pressed to clarify at what point they will be prepared to walk out. Will it be if Ahmadinejad denies the Holocaust, if he questions Israel's right to exist, if he promotes terrorism and the killing of innocent lives? The act of walking out, as has been proven in the past, leaves a lasting impression, as it did at the Durban Review Conference in Geneva in April.

• Speakers from countries other than the United States and Israel must be encouraged to use part of their own addresses – at the United Nation and at the rallies – to directly confront Iran, telling Iran that the world's patience has worn thin. They should underscore this message in their side meetings with other world leaders.

The best example of how to use the UN General Assembly came two years ago when then-president Nestor Kirchner of Argentina used his address to criticize Iran for its sponsorship of the 1994 AMIA bombing, which killed 86 civilians. Kirchner had standing, since Iran was behind two horrific terror attacks in his country. He had credibility, as a major world leader. He had an audience, comprising most of his fellow heads of state.

Iran does care what certain parts of the world think – just not what Americans or American Jews think. In 2007, Iran gave away millions of dollars and signed billions in trade deals in a failed bid to keep Interpol from issuing "red notices" against five of its senior military and intelligence operatives for their role in the AMIA attack. Last April, Iranian voters watched Ahmadinejad be humiliated when European delegates walked out on his anti-Jewish rant at Durban II.

For all the valuable words spoken at rallies and printed in expensive newspaper ads, the actual impact of public Jewish advocacy on impeding the Iranian threat is negligible. Massive public campaigns by American Jews are important to the Jewish community – and to the U.S. government – but they will not persuade other governments to tighten the screws on Iran.

Jews certainly need to make their voices heard, but rallies have limited impact. Compared to the hundreds of thousands who recently marched in Iran against Ahmadinejad, 10,000 Jews in New York are at best a footnote to what everyone already knows: the Tehran regime is not legitimate, and it is a threat to regional and global peace.

Continue the rallies. That is how future leaders are forged, that is how politicians learn our priorities. That is how we teach our children about the importance of standing up against modern-day pharaohs and dictators. But Jewish rallies will not stop Iran.

Iran watches every single diplomatic move in certain parts of the world. They send out their own people to do the convincing and secure their agenda. Jews must do the same in order to restrict and contain Iran. This means ensuring sufficient international pressure so that the regime at last faces real consequences if it proceeds with its nuclear program. This means going government by government, and for this we won't need cameras or microphones.

Zuma urges South African Jews to come home

By MICHAEL BELLING
JTA

JOHANNESBURG — In a speech before his country's main Jewish group, South African President Jacob Zuma issued a call for expatriates to return home.

Many Jews have left South Africa in the years since the initial optimism following the end of apartheid in 1994 dimmed, replaced by concern about crime, political stasis and lack of economic opportunities.

Pessimism in the Jewish community appeared to grow when Zuma, who took office a little more than three months ago, defeated Thabo Mbeki for the leadership of the African National Congress in late 2007. Many young Jews said they were considering immigrating to Australia or Israel.

The community has fallen to approximately 80,000 members from a peak of 120,000 a generation ago.

"This country has a massive skills shortage as a result of decades of neglect and deliberate under-investment," Zuma said to an audience of about 800 at the 54th national conference of the Jewish Board of Deputies, South Africa's Jewish umbrella organization.

"This problem is exacerbated by the emigration of skilled people. We must work to reverse the trend.

"The message we want to send to people who have left the country to live and work abroad is that South Africa will always remain their home, and I will always welcome whatever contribution they can make to building this nation."

The emigration theme was one of many Zuma touched upon in a speech designed to bolster Jewish confidence in his administration. Zuma, whose minimal formal education and unusual lifestyle – he has multiple wives – has made him a subject of some concern in the Jewish community, also talked about religious freedom, anti-Semitism and his country's Middle East policy.

"As president, I regard as one of my duties the need to preserve the unity of this nation, and to cultivate its diversity," Zuma said. "We must remain on guard against any manifestations of anti-Semitism and other intolerances. There is no place in South Africa for racism, tribalism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia."

Zuma, who was accompanied by several cabinet ministers and senior provincial officials, was greeted warmly by the crowd. Though it was the first time Zuma addressed the Jewish community, he met a year ago with a delegation from the Board of Deputies.

Mervyn Smith, president of the African Jewish Congress and a former national president of the Board of Deputies, said Zuma "clearly put out a warm hand to South African Jewry and reiterated the government's belief in freedom of religion."

Jacob Zuma

But, he added, "There are unquestionably elements within the government and supporters of the ANC [African National Congress] who are not quite as correct."

The ANC, which dominates the country's political scene, is strongly pro-Palestinian. More than 80 per cent of the country's Jews support the opposition party, the Democratic Alliance.

For many community members, Zuma is less problematic than his party.

"Right now we believe we have direct access to the president," said Michael Bagraim, national president of the Board of Deputies. "His being a people person does make a difference. He's someone you can sit down and talk to, and you can feel that he's listening to us as Jews. He has always borne in mind that we as the Jewish people are the people of the book."

Zuma addressed the Arab-Israeli conflict in his speech.

"We support the position of the United Nations and the Middle East Quartet that the only viable solution to the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is one that ends the occupation that began in 1967," Zuma told the Jewish gathering. "It is a solution which fulfils the aspirations of both parties for independent homelands through two states for two peoples, Israel and an independent, adjoining and viable state of Palestine living side by side in peace and security."

He called for supporting President Obama's efforts in pushing the objectives.

"We will continue to offer whatever assistance we can towards the resolution of this matter, including sharing our experience in ending apartheid through negotiation," Zuma said. "In this respect, we would like to work together with the South African Jewish community."

Dalia Lichtenstein, a Cape Town lawyer, said that Zuma's outreach to the Jewish community is good, so far.

"I think at the moment we're doing OK," Lichtenstein said. "The dialogue has got to continue, and I think the agreement to disagree and to respect each other is there and it's a very good start."

Jack Bloom, a member of the opposition Democratic Alliance, called the speech "very standard."

"He made good pledges; I hope he delivers on them," Bloom said. "It was a friendly action. It was the president of the country addressing the Jewish community. It was good outreach."

Iran is a gross violator of human rights: Cotler

the danger of indifference to such incitement and the dangers of a culture of impunity which has emerged with [Iranian President Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad's Iran."

Iran is a gross violator of human rights (repressing the Baha'i, women, minorities, dissidents, employing torture and detaining juveniles), is pursuing nuclear weapons and has advocated genocide. It poses "a clear and present danger" not just to Israel but to others as well, Cotler said.

"South Africa should...join other like-minded countries like Canada and the United States to hold Ahmadinejad's Iran to account," he added.

Zuma requested documentation that substantiated the allegations. "They will...study the file, look at the material I will send and keep in touch," Cotler said.

Remarkably, Zuma and senior officials Cotler briefed seemed unaware of Iran's advocacy of genocide. "My sense is that Zuma and others did not appreciate the genocidal threat posed by Iran. They are concerned with South Africa's national agenda of nation-building – health issues like AIDS and the rise in tuberculosis. They're not as familiar with these genocidal issues as one would hope."

During his visit, Cotler renewed acquaintances with "heroes of the anti-apartheid movement," including Constitutional Court justice Albie Sachs and George Bizos. He also met with Winnie Mandela, members of the South African cabinet, Zimbabwean civil rights advocates and he led a session of the South African human rights commission. He also delivered a lecture at Wits University, where he was arrested in 1981.

Cotler was joined by Zuma in addressing the South African Jewish Board of Deputies. Zuma condemned racism, hatred and anti-Semitism. In an indirect reference to the Middle East, the president said, "South Africa condemns violence from any quarter, particularly that which targets civilians," Cotler reported.

The Jewish community maintains good relations with the government and the leadership of the anti-apartheid movement. It is served by "outstanding leadership...It is a leadership that is young, informed and courageous," Cotler said.

Cotler said he may meet Zuma later this month at the UN. Should South Africa support the Canadian resolution it would "be the first concrete sign that its attitude is changing.

"Whatever support we get will be an advance from the situation we have now. It would be an important change in policy," he said.

MSNBC removes Buchanan column defending Hitler

JTA

WASHINGTON — MSNBC took down a Pat Buchanan column defending Hitler's actions hours after a Jewish group urged its removal.

The National Jewish Democratic Council released a statement Sept. 3 urging MSNBC to remove the article from its website.

Buchanan, a conservative pundit, had alleged that Hitler didn't want war and that the Allies' actions were unnecessary.

"MSNBC took the responsible action" in removing the column, NJDC president David Harris said in a statement.

"No worthy news organization should employ and promote a commentator who engages in such vile fiction," Harris said. "This sort of historical revisionism is deplorable."

Buchanan has been accused in the past of making racially insensitive and anti-Semitic comments.

Chavez in Syria lambastes Israel

JTA

NEW YORK — Israel is an imperialist country that annihilates people, Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez said in Syria.

Chavez lashed out at Israel at a joint news conference in Damascus with his Syrian counterpart, Bashar Assad, the Associated Press reported Thursday.

"Israel has become a country that annihilates people and is hostile to peace," Chavez was quoted as saying through an interpreter. "I believe it is a fateful battle. It's either now or never in order to liberate the world from imperialism and change the world from a unipolar into a multi-polar world."

Chavez is in the region on an 11-day visit that will take in Libya, Algeria, Syria, Iran, Belarus and Russia.

The outspoken Venezuelan leader in recent years has been a harsh critic of Israel, expelling its ambassador to Caracas and forming a close alliance with Iran.

Travelling with Chavez on the two-day trip were a delegation of ministers from foreign affairs, industry, mining, energy, petroleum and trade, Bloomberg.com reported.

Prior to arriving in Syria, Chavez attended celebrations in Tripoli, marking Libyan leader Moammar Gadhafi's 40 years in power.

The visits take place against a backdrop of Chavez's recent efforts to forge close relationships between Venezuela and Arab nations.

Israel Briefs

Chemical weapons in blast

An arms cache that exploded in southern Lebanon contained chemical weapons, according to a Kuwaiti newspaper. Al-Siyasa reported last week that three of the eight Hezbollah terrorists killed in the explosion in July died from contact with the chemicals. Hezbollah kept the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon away from the site for 24 hours while the group covered up the chemical traces, the paper reported. Al-Siyasa also wrote that Iran has sent new chemical weapons to Lebanon. Hezbollah has said the explosion was undetonated Israeli ordnance from the 2006 Second Lebanon War. Israel believes Lebanon is stockpiling weapons, a violation of Resolution 1701, which ended the war.

Meeting on joint economics

Israeli and Palestinian officials last week held a high-level meeting to discuss economic issues. The meeting between Silvan Shalom, Israel's deputy prime minister and minister of regional co-operation, and Bassim Khoury, the Palestinian Authority's economics minister, in Jerusalem was the first cabinet-level contact between the two governments since the Netanyahu government took office six months ago.

The officials discussed easing travel restrictions on Palestinian businessmen wishing to enter Israel, increasing Israeli meat exports to areas under PA control and allowing dairy products from the Palestinian Authority into Israel, as well as a proposal to build joint industrial parks. Netanyahu has called for boosting the Palestinian economy as a step toward peace.

Israel seizes Russian vessel

Israel intercepted a Russian-manned cargo ship allegedly carrying secret weapons that had disappeared, a European Union official said. Admiral Tarmo Kouts, the European Union's rapporteur on piracy and a former commander of the Estonian armed forces, told Time that although Russia claimed the ship was carrying lumber, only a shipment of missiles could explain its actions since the alleged hijacking on July 24. "There is the idea that there were missiles aboard, and one can't explain this situation in any other way," Kouts told Time. Russia said the ship, the Arctic Sea, was destined for Algeria with less than $2 million of timber, was hijacked and its tracking device disabled in late July. Russia denied the ship was running weapons to the Middle East. According to Time, Israeli President Shimon Peres met with his Russian counterpart, Dmitry Medvedev, the day after the ship was recovered and the leaders discussed "the sale of Russian weapons and military hardware to countries hostile to Israel."

Lieberman in Africa

Israeli Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman is visiting five African countries. Lieberman left last week for an eight-day trip to Ethiopia, Kenya, Ghana, Nigeria and Uganda. He was accompanied by senior government officials and business leaders.

His first stop was Addis Ababa to open the Ethiopia-Israel economic forum and inaugurate the centre of excellence for developing human resources in agriculture in Ethiopia, a tripartite project of the two countries and USAID. During his trip, Lieberman was scheduled to meet in a Nairobi synagogue with Kenyan Jews and to donate agricultural kits to Kenya. In Uganda, the foreign minister participated in a memorial ceremony for those who fell in the 1976 Entebbe rescue operation. "The visit to Africa is very important in reinforcing and improving Israel's standing" in the international community and will contribute to advancing Israel's interests in international forums," Lieberman said.

A portrait of a restless, adventurous woman

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Her Russian immigrant father was insistent: What kind of a career is writing for a nice Jewish girl?

Fortunately, Ruth Gruber paid him no heed and went on to become a foreign correspondent and the author of 19 books, including Exodus 1947 and Raquela: A Woman of Israel.

Gruber, now 98, is the subject of Bob Richman's evocative biopic, Ahead of Time, which will be screened three times at the Toronto International Film Festival starting on Sept. 12.

The title of his 73-minute documentary, based on Gruber's autobiography, Ahead of Time: My Early Years as a Foreign Correspondent, is most apt.

Gruber, an American who was born in Brooklyn, was a self-assured young woman who had no interest whatsoever in conforming to stereotypes. As the old adage goes, she did not want to be pregnant, barefoot and in the kitchen. And to Gruber, there was no such thing as a glass ceiling.

A rebellious, restless, adventurous and curious person, she was a feminist long before it was fashionable to be one.

The British novelist, Virginia Woolf, whom she knew quite well, once told her that women are perfectly capable of doing anything they set their minds to, and Gruber took her advice to heart.

Winning a fellowship to pursue her studies in Germany after graduating from the University of Wisconsin, Gruber waded into German philosophy, modern English literature and art history in Cologne. There she also witnessed Nazi rallies and listened to a fiery speech delivered by Adolf Hitler himself.

Ruth Gruber at work as a foreign correspondent

Before leaving Germany in 1932, a year before Hitler's ascent to power as Germany's chancellor, she acquired a PhD, the youngest person until then to have earned one. Later in the 1930s, while freelancing for the New York Herald Tribune, she became the first newspaper reporter to fly through Siberia into the Soviet Arctic.

During World War II, at the behest of U.S. Secretary of the Interior Harold Ickes, Gruber went to Alaska to gather material for a report she would write on the prospects of developing that future state for Americans after the war. In 1944, again for Ickes, she was assigned the task of bringing 1,000 Jewish refugees from Europe.

Returning to journalism in 1946, Gruber covered the newly created Anglo-American Committee of Inquiry on Palestine, whose mandate was to decide the fate of 100,000 Jewish refugees languishing in European displaced persons camps.

While covering this story, Gruber witnessed the arrival of the refugee ship Exodus in Haifa. The British authorities sent back the Jewish refugees to France, and from there, Gruber accompanied them to Germany.

En route to the port of Hamburg, Gruber wrote about and photographed the refugees. The Herald Tribune ran her dispatches and Life published her stark photographs.

The Exodus incident, she says in the film, was the high point of her life as a reporter. "That's my story," she says. "It had everything."

In drawing a portrait of Gruber, Richman concentrates on her activities in the Soviet Union, Alaska, wartime Europe and Palestine and her friendship with the publisher of the Herald Tribune, who considered her something of a surrogate daughter.

For reasons best known to himself, Richman does not venture beyond her reporting stints in Europe and the Middle East, neglecting to tell us about her subsequent assignments in Israel and Ethiopia. Richman informs us that Gruber got married and had children, but strangely enough, he leaves out the details completely.

Nonetheless, Ahead of Time remains an interesting film about a spunky and engaging woman.

Israeli romantic drama is genuine and poignant

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Leonid Prudovsky's Five Hours From Paris is a romantic drama that exudes genuine, heartfelt emotions.

Scheduled to be presented at the Toronto International Film Festival at three public screeenings starting on Sept. 12, it is poignant to the core.

Two people, a divorced and lonely Israeli taxi driver and an attractive and married Russian immigrant music teacher, reach out for each other, but their polite courtship is not meant to be.

If Prudovsky had cut corners and cheapened the story, the ending would have been far more predictable. But since he's a classy filmmaker, he does not pander to the lowest common denominator.

As a result, his film is achingly realistic and credible.

Yigal (Dror Keren), the taxi driver, is a balding, anxiety-prone fellow who is starved for love and touched by the bittersweet sound of French music.

Since he is afraid of flying and may never visit the city of his dreams, Paris, he watches planes taking off from Ben-Gurion Airport.

Lina (Helena Yaralova), the teacher at Yigal's son's school, lives alone in Tel Aviv. Her husband, Gregory (Vladimir Friedman), a doctor, is in Canada, where he is trying to pass qualifying exams that will enable him to practise medicine in a Canadian setting.

Although Yigal realizes that Lina is spoken for, he courts her, knowing that his chances of seducing her are exceedingly slim. After they exchange gifts, Lina warms to Yigal and eventually develops feelings for him.

Just when you think that Yigal is on the verge of striking gold, Lina's husband suddenly turns up in Tel Aviv, crushing Yigal and deflating a viewer's assumptions.

Nonetheless, Yigal persists, hoping against hope that Lina will choose him over her husband as her lifelong mate.

Helena Yaralova and Dror Keren

As these dynamics play out, Gregory waits in great anticipation for his Canadian immigration papers, a document that may well remove Lina permanently from the scene.

Five Hours From Paris unfolds at an unhurried pace, letting Yigal and Lina get to know each other, both on a platonic and substantive level.

The actors, the unprepossessing Keren and the sensual Yaralova, blend into their respective roles with effortless ease and aplomb. They do not make you think that they are merely actors who have memorized their lines to perfection.

This 90-minute fast-flowing film portrays Tel Aviv as a Mediterranean city of boxy apartment buildings, palm trees and a stunning coastline.

Canada, though never seen on the screen, comes off as a beautiful country with an unfortunately cold climate.

Five Hours From Paris will be screened on Saturday, Sept. 12 at 2:45 p.m. at the Scotiabank Theatre, Sunday, Sept. 13 at 7:45 p.m. at the Varsity 5 and Wednesday, Sept. 16 at 5 p.m. at the Varsity 6.

'Unknown' actor gets lead in new Coen brothers movie

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

It's a stroke of good luck for actor Michael Stuhlbarg that he's somewhat unknown to movie audiences.

It's exactly what award-winning filmmakers Joel and Ethan Coen had in mind when casting him in the lead role of Larry Gopnik in their film A Serious Man, which makes its world première at the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) on Sept. 12 at the Elgin Theatre.

Stuhlbarg is, however, a seasoned New York stage actor who has worked with Joel Coen's wife, actress Frances McDormand (Burn After Reading's Linda Litzke).

"Frances and I became friendly when we worked together, so she invited Joel to come see me in a play I was doing off Broadway at the time — David Mamet's adaptation of Harley Granville Barker's play The Voysey Inheritance," Stuhlbarg told The CJN over the phone from Manhattan.

Originally, the actor auditioned for the Yiddish-speaking character, Velvel, in A Serious Man and hired a Yiddish tutor before auditioning. The Coens, however, decided to go with Allen Lewis Rickman, an actor who speaks fluent Yiddish, so Stuhlbarg read for the parts of Larry and his brother, Arthur. Several months passed before Stuhlbarg landed the role of U.S. mid-western physics professor Larry Gopnik.

"I was thrilled. I would have been glad to have done anything in their movies, so this was a big treat," the actor humbly admits about the Coen brothers, whose films include No Country For Old Men and Burn After Reading. "I absolutely loved the script. I just trusted that they thought I could do it, and I just loved the individual acting challenges the script afforded me."

And Stuhlbarg is brilliant as Larry, the content man who is oblivious to those around him in this movie that's set in 1967. His daughter, Sarah, is saving up for a nose job and snatches money from his wallet; his son, Danny, whose bar mitzvah is approaching, secretly listens to his radio during Hebrew class and buys marijuana whenever he has the cash; and his unemployable brother, Arthur (Richard Kind), lives on their couch and gets into endless trouble.

Michael Stuhlbarg stars in writer/directors Joel and Ethan Coen's A Serious Man, an Alliance Films release.

But when Larry's wife, Judith (Sari Lennick), announces she's fallen for their mutual friend Sy Ableman (Fred Melamed) and wants a divorce, Larry's world starts crashing down. When he seeks the advice of three sage rabbis, the audience is in for an incredible ride as the Coen brothers create absurd circumstances for Larry that are hilarious and serious.

Stuhlbarg's experience working with the dynamic duo that writes, produces and directs avant-garde films was fantastic, he said. "Their material is so unique to them, and they have detailed everything down to every last moment. In the mornings, you'll receive your sides [scenes] they're going to shoot that day with copies of their storyboards for those scenes – they are so well prepared.

"They are very particular about what their characters say, but hands off in terms of the actor's approach, unless they feel you've veered off in the wrong direction with the character," said Stuhlbarg, who is excited about attending TIFF with the Coens. "They want to hear what you have to say and give information about what they are thinking. It's a very collaborative process."

The film screens on Sept. 12 at 9 p.m. at the Visa Screening Room (Elgin) and on Sept. 14 at 9 a.m. at the ScotiaBank Theatre 1. For tickets, call 416-968-FILM or 1-877-968-FILM. The film will open in theatres in selected cities on Oct 2.

MADONNA IN ISRAEL: About 50,000 fans turned up at Hayarkon Park in Tel Aviv last week to see Madonna perform in concert for the first time in 16 years. The pop star wrapped up her worldwide Sticky & Sweet tour with two concerts. "Every time I come here, I get so supercharged with energy," she said. "I truly believe that Israel is the energy centre of the world. I also believe that if we can all live together in harmony in this place, then we can live in peace all over the world." At the end of her show, the 51-year-old who has dabbled in Kaballah and has taken on the Hebrew name, Esther, walked off the stage wrapped up in an Israeli flag. [Orit Pnini/Israel Sun photo]

Robyn Israel's play focuses on her last name

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

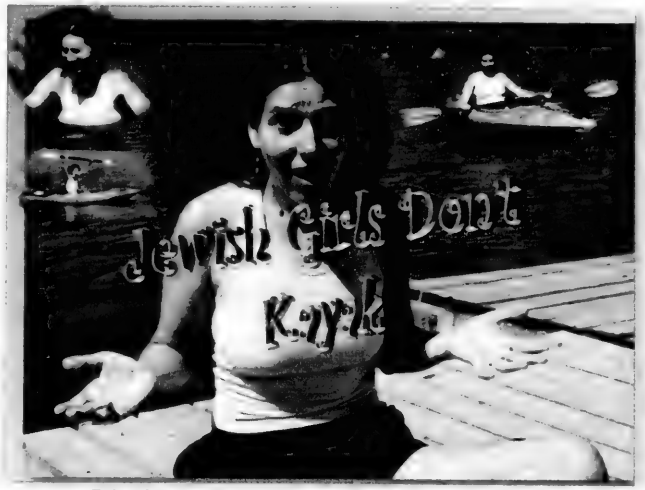
Robyn Israel says it's a thrill to resurrect her grandparents, whom she's never met, in her one-woman show Jewish Girls Don't Kayak.

"I play dozens of characters," the London, Ont.-based playwright-actress says, "including three generations of my family. I never knew any of my grandparents. I have pictures of them up on the stage, and it's special for me to be able to bring them back to life in my play," she says, her voice noticeably emotional over the phone.

Jewish Girls Don't Kayak, which plays at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in Toronto on Sept. 12 at 8 p.m., is about many things, but mostly about what it was like for Israel to grow up with that surname and the name's impact on three generations of her family.

"It's a semi-autobiographical account of my life, but the real focus is on my last name and how we got that name. It's about the evolution of a name and of a family."

She says the play is basically about growing up in a Montreal Jewish setting with a traditional Jewish upbringing and her bohemian sojourn in California. It's a look at an unconventional person who embraces other cultures while trying to maintain her Jewish identity.



Robyn Israel can kayak quite well despite being a Jewish girl.

"I always felt uncomfortable having such a Jewish name. As I got older, I started to date outside the faith. I started to struggle with my Judaism and found myself drawn to other cultures."

The play is a series of vignettes drawn from experiences in her life. Among the characters she plays are her immigrant grandfather, her mother and her Buddhist ex-boyfriend.

Some scenes, including the ones on her website [www.robynisrael.com], are humorous looks at her life experiences, similar to standup comedy. However, Israel insists her 90-minute play is not all comedy.

"There are many poignant bits. It gets very personal," she says. "I wear my heart on my sleeve. I talk about my relationship breakups and anti-Semitism. It's definitely not all laughs."

She says the play is also about the Jewish experience. "Good and bad. Funny and sad."

A shorter version of the play won an award for outstanding comedy at the London Fringe Festival in 2007. Since then she's revamped it and is taking it on the road, which also includes Hamilton, Montreal and New York.

"It really taps into the larger human experience – what it's like to be a daughter, what it's like to be a divorcée, what it's like to be in a relationship. Every person who comes to see it relates with it on some level. Not just as a Jew but as a human being," she says.

The play also attempts to break stereotypes. The title comes from the notion that Jewish people have no athletic skills. Ironically, when first contacted for this interview, Israel was on a canoe trip.

Tickets to the Miles Nadal JCC show on Sept. 12 are available at the door. She brings her show to Hamilton on Oct. 17 at the Staircase Café Theatre, 27 Dundurn St. Call 905-529-3000 for tickets.

David Gale

Names in the News: Howard Adler of Ottawa, who is both Ojibwa and Jewish, was the first prize winner of this year's Aboriginal Writing Challenge, which encourages aboriginal youth (ages 14 to 29) to write a short story about a defining moment or event in aboriginal history.

Adler, of the Lac des Mille Lac First Nation, submitted a video script, Johnny Seven Fires, written in Ojibwa with English translations, touching on aboriginal legends and important historical places. His entry was chosen from more than 250 submissions from across the country. Adler receives a $2,000 prize and a trip to Calgary for the awards ceremony. The two first-place entries are to be published in The Beaver, the magazine of Canadian history.

Names in the News II: Montreal veteran writer Joe King (who was born and raised in Toronto) is in the running for the Mavis Gallant Prize for non-fiction for his recent book Fabled City: The Jews of Montreal. The book is proving a popular success, too, having sold thousands of copies since its release several months ago. The prize is offered by the Quebec Writers Federation.

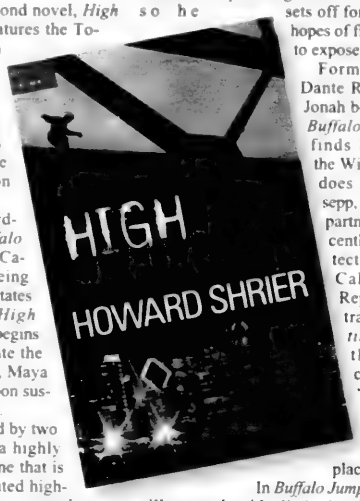
High Chicago blends mystery, suspense

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Howard Shrier's second novel, High Chicago, again features the Toronto-based Jewish detective Jonah Geller. It ups the ante from his previous novel in terms of the forces Jonah is confronting, but more significantly in terms of the damage the world ends up inflicting on him.



Whereas Shrier's award-winning debut novel Buffalo Jump dealt as much with Canadian pharmaceuticals being smuggled into the United States as it did with murder, High Chicago (Vintage Canada) begins with a request to investigate the suicide of a young woman, Maya Cantor. It is a case Jonah soon suspects is actually a homicide.

Maya's death is followed by two more mysterious deaths, a highly disturbing situation, and one that is tied to a dangerously polluted high-rise development that is being erected in Toronto's Harbourfront area.

All this eventually pits Jonah against Simon Birk, a ruthless Donald Trump-like Chicago real estate mogul whom Jonah is determined to bring down. But he has no evidence implicating Simon in any crime, so he sets off for Chicago in hopes of finding a way to expose the man.

Former hit man Dante Ryan, whom Jonah befriended in Buffalo Jump, also finds his way to the Windy City, as does Jenn Raudsepp, Jonah's new partner in his recently set up detective agency. Called World Repairs, it is a translation of tikkun olam, the Jewish concept of "repairing the world" and making it a better place.

In Buffalo Jump, Jonah was still somewhat idealistic despite witnessing his girlfriend die in a terrorist attack in Israel, and stubbornly clung to the belief that he could make a difference as a private investigator. In High Chicago, those ideals are completely tarnished as Jonah realizes he can only defeat Simon by operating outside the confines of the law.

In that regard, Shrier has structured this book very differently from Buffalo Jump, which was a cleverly plotted mystery that took a roundabout, unpredictable route to its exciting resolution.

High Chicago, like Simon Birk himself, is blunt and tough, and does not attempt to disguise (most of) its mysteries. That seems like a flaw at first, but Shrier is too good a writer not to be doing this on purpose.

Chicago is after all much bigger than Buffalo, so its challenges would naturally be more overwhelming for Jonah.

High Chicago fascinates because one can feel how overmatched Jonah is and thus wonder how and if he'll come out of this adventure in one piece.

Add to that Shrier's wry and witty observations on Chicago's superior waterfront area and architecture, which is immediately apparent to anyone who has ever visited the city, and you end up with a gripping second novel that's not at all like his first.

The book has its flaws, with a plot that occasionally strains credulity, notably during the climax, and Shrier's tendency to indicate which streets all the action takes place on gets annoying, but he doesn't repeat himself or fail to deepen his main character.

On the other hand, Jonah grows in stature and complexity and thus becomes more interesting.

With High Chicago, Shrier cements his reputation as a fine mystery writer. I suspect and hope that he and Jonah will be around for a long time to come.

New and recent releases

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

There are so many newly released books that come to our office each month that properly reviewing them all is an insurmountable task.

Here are some recent releases that we haven't been able to review yet.

Safe Passage by Ida Cook (Harlequin). Originally published in 1950, it is the true story of two English sisters, Ida and Louise Cook, who come of age between the wars and seemed destined to never stray from their quiet London suburban lives. But a chance hearing of an aria from Madame Butterfly sparked a passion in them that became a vehicle for the rescue of dozens of Jews facing persecution and death.

The Jewish Husband by Italian author Lia Levi won the Moravia Prize for fiction in 2001. Published in English for the first time by Europa Editions, it tells the story of a young Jewish professor in Mussolini's Italy who entertains a tormented passion for Sonia, the beautiful enigmatic daughter of a prominent gentile family. It is an account of a country and a time about which too little has been written, and above all, a tender love story set at a time in which the world appeared to have lost its ability to show tenderness.

From Elie Wiesel comes Rashi (Random House), which introduces the reader to the towering figure of Rashi — Rabbi Shlomo Yitzhaki — the great biblical and talmudic commentator of the Middle Ages. Wiesel, a descendant of Rashi, proves a consummate guide who enables us to appreciate both the lucidity of Rashi's writings and the tumultuous world in which they were formed.

Third Reich in the Ivory Tower: Complicity and Conflict on American Campuses by Stephen H. Norwood (Cambridge University Press) is the first systematic exploration of the nature and extent of sympathy for Nazi Germany at American universities during the 1930s. In those prewar days, American universities welcomed Nazi officials to campus and participated enthusiastically in student exchange programs with universities in Nazi Germany.

The Knife Sharpener's Bell by Rhea Tregebov (Coteau) is a poetic and wise novel that chronicles a young girl from her home in 1930s Winnipeg to her parent's homeland in Russia through the vast ideological differences and the turmoil of war. Tregebov, a Canadian writer who is assistant professor of Creative Writing at the University of British Columbia, writes a remarkable book that bridges the two worlds of Canada and the Soviet Union through almost a century of history and traces the lives of many characters who find themselves caught in the jaws of ideology.

Israeli, Palestinian mayors join forces

By GIL SHEFLER
JTA

NEW YORK — Even as Israeli and Palestinian leaders argue about the conditions that must be in place for a return to the negotiating table, they are striking similar tones on the need for economic development.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salam Fayyad unveiled an economic plan last week intended to bring about a stable, independent Palestinian state within two years, while Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu has been talking for months about the need for "economic peace."

Salam Fayyad

Some local Israeli and Palestinian officials are taking matters into their own hands, instead of waiting for rhetoric to translate into action.

This week, the Jewish mayor of a region in northern Israel adjacent to the West Bank announced a plan with the governor of the West Bank city of Jenin for a joint industrial zone, co-existence projects and a sports league that would bring together the region's Israeli and Palestinian children.

"We believe that life in the Middle East can be different," said Danny Atar, the Jewish mayor of the Gilboa Regional Council, a mountainous area of Israel with 22,000 people, located between Jenin and Beit She'an.

"We're taking responsibility and combining politics with economics. We are building an industrial park that will provide employment for 15,000 Palestinians and 2,000 Israelis."

The plan is unusual not only because it represents a co-ordinated effort between local Israeli and Palestinian officials, but also because it involves the Palestinian governor of a city that until recently was known as the suicide-bomber capital of the West Bank, and because the project is being supported by Jewish groups in the United States.

Jenin's governor, Qadoura Qadoura, says now is the time for co-operation.

"No two people can live beside each other while one is prospering and the other is not," he said.

Qadoura and Atar, along with Atar's Israeli-Arab deputy, Eid Saleem, are on a U.S. tour this week trying to sell their idea to the Jewish public and win investors for the project.

The plan calls for establishing a joint Israel-Palestinian industrial park just inside the West Bank that will manufacture products such as olive oil and packaged salad greens to be exported to overseas markets via Israel. It also involves setting up cultural centres to teach Hebrew to Palestinians and Arabic to Israeli Jews, organizing women's empowerment courses and holding sports tournaments for children from both communities.

"The plans are already all set up," Atar said at a recent news conference at the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations in New York.

"It is in my own benefit as an Israeli that the Palestinians do well, and we hope that two years from now it will start operating. We will provide the infrastructure from the Israeli side, but this is their project. It is entirely up to them to make it succeed, and that makes all the difference."

Robert Zwank, the executive director of the Jewish Federation of Western Connecticut who organized the tour, says he hopes the plan will be extended to other parts of Israel and the West Bank.

"As a bottom-up initiative, it has to be supported by people in the private sector," he said in a phone interview.

Seven years ago, few could have imagined Jenin as a model of coexistence. A hotbed of militancy from which Palestinian terrorist groups dispatched suicide bombers to strike Israeli cities, Jenin was the site of a 2002 Israeli army incursion that left many dead on both sides and leveled parts of the city's refugee camp.

Now, however, Jenin is one of the places Palestinian and U.S. officials tout as a model of success for a revamped Palestinian security force, and even some Israeli officials speak of a changed atmosphere in the city.

"I can walk around Jenin without a guard, without any of Qadoura's people," Atar said. "It is now a paradigm of good security and good governance."

Qadoura, a member of P.A. President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah Party, says the project will help bolster moderates among Palestinians and weaken support for Hamas and its radicalism.

"We have our radicals and it is of concern, but when we have over 50 per cent unemployment and 6,000 graduates without work, then they become targets for radicals," Qadoura said.

This isn't the first attempt at a joint Palestinian-Israeli industrial project. Perhaps the best known is the industrial park at the Erez Crossing, on the north end of the Gaza Strip. Once a thriving commercial area that provided employment for thousands of Palestinians, it now lies vacant following repeated attacks by Hamas on the facility.

Researchers to decipher ancient texts

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israeli researchers said Thursday they are developing a computer program that will make ancient documents more legible and easily indexed, which could eventually lead to a searchable catalog of archived historical texts.

The program, which is being developed by a team of computer scientists and historians at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, would make ancient texts that have faded, smudged or been written over easier to read.

Jihad El-Sana, a researcher on the project and assistant professor of computer science, explained that the program will be able to determine which documents are original through a process called writer identification.

"We are developing a kind of technology to enhance documents' visual properties for two reasons: to make them easier to read and because we want to archive and index them," El-Sana said.

"As more and more documents are digitized, the kind of program the team is developing would cut the time it takes to study these ancient texts," said Daphna Weinshall, a computer science professor at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem.

"If they can just digitize these documents, machines are much more efficient than humans. Once it's on the computer, they can do it a lot easier," Weinshall said.

Israeli tennis star a finalist at Rogers Cup

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

Israeli tennis star Andy Ram showed why he is revered in his homeland by winning three tough matches at the recent Rogers Cup tournament to finish as a doubles finalist.

Ram played with partner Max Mirnyi of Belarus, adding to his landmark achievements at the Rogers Cup in Montreal, where he finished as a finalist in 2005 and a semi-finalist in 2007, both with Jonathan Erlich of Israel.

The only other Israeli who fared as well at the Rogers Cup was Harel Levy, the singles finalist in 2000.

Playing before thousands of spectators, many waving Israeli flags, Ram and Mirnyi delighted fans with lobs, drop shots, volleys and aces, to defeat three opponents before losing in the doubles final.

Along the path to the final, Ram and Mirnyi defeated Raphael Nadal and Franco Rois of Spain 4-6, 6-3, 10-8; Czechs Lukas Dlouhy and Philipp Petzchner 6-2, 6-3; and top-seeded American brothers Bob and Mike Bryan 7-6, 6-2 before losing in the final 6-4, 6-3 to Mahesh Brupathni of India and Mark Knowles of Bahamas.

"I love playing in Montreal because the crowd support is so good, and that helped Max [Mirnyi] and I play our best. We are disappointed that we lost the final, but resolve to return next year to win the tournament," Ram told the crowd at the ceremony awarding prizes to the champions and the finalists.

The Mirnyi/Ram team has partnered for a year since Ram's regular partner, Jonathan Erlich of Israel, hurt his elbow last fall, keeping him out of action. Mirnyi/Ram moved up from eighth to fifth place in the world doubles rankings because of their performance in Montreal.

"Andy is such a good partner with me because he handles the net well and backs up my serves and volleys. We have very good communication and are friends off the court as well, which only adds to our success," Mirnyi said after the match.

This year is especially memorable for Ram, who led the Israeli Davis Cup squad to its first berth ever in the semi-final round. Partnering with Erlich, the duo defeated the Russian team of Marat Safin and Igor Kunitsyn 6-3, 6-4, 6-7, 4-6, 6-4 to clinch the 3-0 sweep of Russia in the Davis Cup quarter-final tie before 10,000 screaming fans in Tel Aviv on July 11.

Israel is currently ranked fourth among Davis Cup nations, yet surpassed the achievements of the American, Australian and Argentine teams that are normally favoured to win the Davis Cup. The Canadian Davis Cup squad is ranked 31st.

"Nothing beats representing your country and winning such a historic match. Along with my other teammates [Harel Levy, Dudi Sela and Erlich], we showed that playing for your country can really raise the level of play. Nobody outside of our team gave us much of a chance to beat the Russians, and we showed what hustle and belief can do," Ram said.

Ram added that winning for Israel in the Davis Cup means a lot more to him than any of his tournament titles. Ram has won 16 tournaments with four partners, most notably the Australian Open men's doubles title with Erlich, the French Open mixed doubles title with Natalie Dechy of France and the Wimbledon mixed doubles title with Vera Zvonareva of Russia.

Ram also gained fame by becoming the first Israeli to play in the Dubai tennis tournament in February, only one week following the banning of Israeli female tennis star Shahar Pe'er by the United Arab Emirates, whose government denied her entry to the nation. Women's Tennis Association officials fined the Dubai tournament $300,000 and compensated Pe'er both financially and in her rankings.

The men's tennis association would have boycotted the Dubai tournament had Ram been refused entry into the Dubai tournament.

"It was disgusting to see the politics being played, and I'm glad that justice prevailed and that Shahar [Pe'er] was compensated and I was able to play in Dubai," Ram said.

In Montreal, Sela, one of Ram's teammates for Israel in the Davis Cup, lost his opening round match in singles to Alex Falla of Columbia 6-4, 3-6, 6-3. American qualifier Jesse Levine, an American Jew born in Ottawa, lost his opening round match 6-3, 6-4 to fellow American John Isner.

City of David archeologists discover ancient fortification

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli archeologists uncovered a large fortification that was likely used by the Canaanites and that dates to the Middle Bronze period.

The 26-foot-high and very thick wall was likely used by the Canaanites to protect the path to an important water source, according to the Israel Antiquities Authority.

The discovery, in the "Walls Around Jerusalem" National Park in the City of David, is "the first time that such massive construction that predates the Herodian period has been discovered in Jerusalem," according to a news release from the authority.

A small section of the wall was discovered in 1909, but the recent excavations determined how large the wall actually is. Nearly 80 feet of the wall has now been uncovered, but it's believed that it continues to run westward beyond the part that was exposed.

The fortification was revealed to the public for the first time last week as part of the 10th Annual Archaeological Conference on the discoveries in the City of David.

BROWNED ONION KUGELS IN MUFFIN TINS

1 1/4 c sour cream
1 tblsp poppy seeds
1 tsp salt
1 3/4 c med. egg noodles
1 stick unsalted butter
2 lg. onion, chopped
1 1/4 c cottage cheese
4 lg eggs
1/4 tsp black pepper
muffin tin with 12 muffin cups.

Preheat oven to 425°F. Cook noodles in pot of boiling salted water 5 min. Rinse in colander under cold water and drain. Melt butter in frypan; brush muffin cups with some of butter. Add onions to pan; cook until well browned, about 20 min. Transfer onions to large bowl, stir in noodles, sour cream, cottage cheese, poppy seeds. Lightly beat eggs with salt and pepper, stir into noodle mixture until combined. Divide mixture among muffin cups, bake until puffed and golden, 20-25 min. Loosen edges of kugels with a thin knife and cool in pan 5 min. before serving.

Remembering a prostitute on the High Holidays

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

I'm writing this after spending three days on the street living with the homeless.

While out there, I was deeply touched and highly disappointed, and at times full of joy, inspiration and sadness. What I experienced on the street with my colleagues Alvaro Castellanos, Boris Castellanos and Jacqueline Stein was equivalent to my first trip to Israel in terms of its impact. It was powerful.

URBAN WRITER

It was tough out there – some of our neighbourhoods are rotting – and yes, disappointing. We spent time with women who were raped as children, women who were burned, slashed, imprisoned, prostituted and used crack cocaine for years. One person told us about her "steel babysitter," the dryer in her home where her mother would put her so she could go out drinking.

We listened closely to humiliating details about these individuals' personal holocausts so that we could learn how not to love, and so that we could spread their message of survival and humanity. This was a crucial part of what we were doing, because simply to hear about suffering and do nothing is shameful.

It was inspiring out there. Many of these same women are now counselling others on how to create a better life for themselves. Today, Theresa Schrader, our street adviser, a former long-term crack user and prostitute, has a delightful two-year-old son, Marcus, and is starting social work school. Theresa was the winner of Ve'ahavta's creative writing contest for the homeless in 2005 and credits the Jewish community for much of her growth.

A conclusion I reached after three days on the street was that the world needs to learn how to love better. This became dramatically clear as I listened to story after story of abuse, terror, torture and pain happening right here in our own neighbourhoods. In Toronto the friendly, men, women and children are being loved so badly that it's killing them.

Yet while I was out there, I encountered people in Regent Park, Parkdale and elsewhere who have courageously battled their demons and won, and today they talk about their experiences openly.

This was another one of my conclusions, something our beloved Jewish community needs to learn from, embrace and emulate. Simply put, in 5770, the Jewish community (and the world) should commit to being accepting of suffering and create an environment in which an abused woman, drug addict or alcoholic can openly and freely tell his or her story.

In 5770, let us commit to greeting, embracing and hearing from the Jewish teenager or young woman or aging man who fought mental illness, depression or a deeply melancholic state and rose up to become a poet or raise a beautiful family and conduct a highly functional life.

There's so much elegance and sheer growth we hold back from one another by being scared of ourselves and each other. We're so guarded and terrified of being really seen that we miss telling and hearing superb stories, such as the man who went bankrupt and came back to build a fine business, because we're still too embarrassed about the bankruptcy.

In 5770, let us learn how to show our foibles and be at ease with the reality that we're all flawed. Let us allow for and encourage individual testimonials and collectively respect the entire human package. Only then will we see the glory of our peoplehood more clearly. This will make us whole.

The High Holidays are approaching. Let us pray for the communal resolve to emulate the life of a former prostitute who valiantly and publicly challenges that which is unsightly and ferociously grabs on to beauty. Shanah Tovah.

"The entire purpose of our existence is to overcome our negative habits."

Reaching toward our kinfolk

Editorial

The photo above is not staged, although it is so cute that there may be some skeptics. But it captures a real moment, and actually captures the endearing segment of a drama.

The four youngsters are standing on a moving sidewalk at Ben-Gurion Airport in Tel Aviv, waving the shalom of greeting at a clutch of photographers vying for the most heart-melting image of the four adorable children. We cannot be sure, but it is very likely the clothes they are wearing are new, given to them by Israeli officials, either on the verge of their departure from their former home, or at the moment of their arrival at their new one.

The children – from left, Leah, Rachel, Yehoshua and Menashe – are members of the Ben Israel family. They, their parents and three siblings escaped from Ra'ina in the Omran province of Yemen in mid-February. More accurately, they were rescued by the Jewish Agency for Israel.

Their father, one of the leaders of the 230-person Jewish community in Ra'ina, had his life threatened. Trying to make good on the threat, someone threw a grenade into the courtyard of the family's home.

In December, Moshe Yaish Nahari, a father of nine and brother of a prominent rabbi, was murdered near his home in Rida by a Muslim extremist.

Some 280 Jews live in Yemen. But extremist Muslims no longer wish to abide a Jewish presence there.

On Feb. 19, the nine-person Ben-Israel family and two other Jews from Yemen landed in Israel in successful execution of a secret, many-layered, dangerous rescue operation.

Thus, while the photo above is one of four delighted youngsters at Ben-Gurion Airport, it is also a photo that embodies the visible reach of the collective Jewish hand toward endangered kinfolk.

The News in Brief

Canada

Accused in Court

OTTAWA — The man accused of murdering the president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO while she was vacationing in Barbados appeared in court last week for a preliminary hearing, the Ottawa Citizen reported. Curtis Joel Foster, 24, is accused of killing Terry Schwarzfeld, 60, during a Feb. 28 robbery on a beach in which her daughter-in-law, Luana Cotsman, was also seriously injured. The women were beaten with a piece of wood. Schwarzfeld died in Ottawa on March 18 after sustaining head injuries. Cotsman has since recovered. Foster pleaded guilty last year to four robberies involving tourists on the same beach, and he faces a charge of raping a German tourist in July 2008.

Conductor Honoured

MONTREAL — Quebec Premier Jean Charest decorated Yoav Talmi, the Israeli artistic director and conductor of the Quebec Symphony Orchestra (QSO), with the insignia of officer of the National Order of Quebec in a Sept. 9 ceremony at the Grand Théâtre de Québec. Since taking the helm of the orchestra in 1998, Talmi has brought it up to an artistic level on par with the best in Canada, and greatly enhanced the public's interest in classical music and the cultural life of Quebec in general, Charest said. In that time, the QSO has made seven recordings, all critically well received, and earned a number of prizes. Talmi is also principal guest conductor of the Israel Chamber Orchestra in Tel Aviv. Over his long career, he has conducted orchestras in Europe, the United States and elsewhere. Talmi also holds an honorary doctorate from Laval University.

World

School Firebombed

MARSEILLE — A Jewish school in southern France was firebombed on Sept. 9. No one was injured in the morning attack on the ORT Bramson Jewish school in Marseille. About 66 feet of cypress hedges were set afire, and four parked cars in front of the building were burned by homemade aerosol bombs, reports said. Three bombs were found on the premises, Associated Press reported. Some 400 students weren't aware there had been an attack because the targeted area wasn't near any classrooms, the school's director told the Le Metro daily. No suspects have been identified, but school security cameras were given to police. The local police chief said his force will pay "particular attention" to Jewish institutions on the upcoming holidays.

Incidents Jump

AMSTERDAM — The number of anti-Semitic incidents in Holland in January was nearly equal to the number in all of 2008, a new report shows. The annual report of the national organization charged with monitoring anti-Semitism in the country reported 98 attacks in January. There were 108 attacks in all of 2008. Anti-Semitic incidents rose around the world in January during Israel's Gaza offensive. The anti-Semitism watchdog group criticized Holland's justice system and police for being reluctant to process claims of anti-Semitism, and urged that Holocaust denial not be decriminalized.

Guidelines Released

NEW YORK — The Conservative movement has released detailed guidelines for earning approval from its ethical food certification initiative. The rules for earning a Magen Tzedek, or seal of justice, are 175 pages long and detail standards in five areas: treatment of employees, animal welfare, consumer issues, corporate integrity and environmental impact. Among the requirements is that food producers must pay their lowest-paid workers 115 per cent of the U.S. federal minimum wage, and provide them with benefits of at least 35 per cent of wages. The initiative, run by the Hekhsher Tzedek commission in co-ordination with the Conservative movement's leadership, began in response to revelations of worker mistreatment at what was once the United States' largest kosher slaughterhouse in Postville, Iowa.

Carter Makes One-state Prediction

WASHINGTON — Israelis and Palestinians are on a path to forming one state, Jimmy Carter said.

"A two-state solution is clearly preferable and has been embraced at the grassroots," the former U.S. president said in a Sept. 6 opinion piece in the Washington Post. He said one state "is obviously the goal of Israeli leaders who insist on colonizing the West Bank and east Jerusalem."

Jimmy Carter

"A majority of the Palestinian leaders with whom we met are seriously considering acceptance of one state, between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea," Carter added. "By renouncing the dream of an independent Palestine, they would become fellow citizens with their Jewish neighbours and then demand equal rights within a democracy. In this non-violent civil rights struggle, their examples would be Mahatma Gandhi, Martin Luther King Jr. and Nelson Mandela."

Carter said that "Non-Jews are already a slight majority of total citizens in this area, and within a few years, Arabs will constitute a clear majority."

He wrote the piece after a visit to the region with the "Elders," who include Archbishop Desmond Tutu, former Irish president Mary Robinson of Ireland and former Norwegian prime minister Gro Brundtland. The group visited Gaza, which Carter called in his piece "a walled-in ghetto inhabited by 1.6 million Palestinians, 1.1 million of whom are refugees from Israel and the West Bank."

In the past 16 months, Carter has visited the Mideast four times and met with leaders in Israel, Egypt, Lebanon, Saudi Arabia, Jordan, Syria, the West Bank and Gaza.

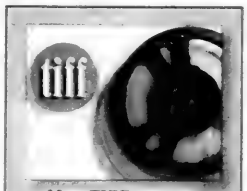
Ticket sales strong for Tel Aviv spotlight

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ticket sales for the Toronto International Film Festival's City to City Spotlight on Tel Aviv have been strong, despite protests over the decision to showcase films about Israel's largest city.



More TIFF coverage
Please see pages 4, 37, 65, 66

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto chair David Koschitsky circulated an e-mail earlier this month urging the Jewish community to support the showcase by buying tickets to the screenings. He sent a followup e-mail update last week that said "sales have been brisk and tickets were, for a time, sold out.

"A new block of tickets has opened up and we urge you, once again, to see as many Israeli films as possible in order to stand with Israel against untruthful and unwarranted attacks," he said.

Tel Aviv mayor Ron Huldai told The CJN's Sheldon Kirshner on Sunday that all the films in the 10-film program had sold out, but on Monday, tickets were still available for five movies that had yet to be screened.

Hundreds of names were added to a letter last week that protests the City to City Spotlight, but other famous filmmakers spoke out in support of TIFF's decision to showcase Israeli film.

Filmmaker and York University professor John Greyson announced late last month that he had pulled his film from the festival, and subsequently, more than 50 actors, directors, and authors – including author Naomi Klein and actors Jane Fonda and Danny Glover – endorsed an online letter on Sept. 2 titled "The Toronto Declaration: No Celebration of Occupation." Last week, more celebrities, including actors Viggo Mortensen and Julie Christie and singer Harry Belafonte, joined the protest.

Jon Voight examines a missile in Sderot. The actor lashed out at critics of Tel Aviv's inclusion in the film festival.

The signatories said that they weren't protesting the Israeli filmmakers, but they were objecting to TIFF's decision to stage "a propaganda campaign on behalf of... an apartheid regime... especially in the wake of this year's brutal assault on Gaza."

In support of the festival and in opposition to what they deplored as censorship, film industry heavyweights Jon Voight, Minnie Driver, Ivan Reitman, Norman Jewison and Robert Lantos released statements to counter claims that the Tel Aviv spotlight is part of the "Israeli propaganda machine," and to "keep political hatred out of the artistic community."

In a letter released last week, Voight said Fonda – with whom he starred in the anti-Vietnam war film Coming Home – "is backing the wrong people again" and accused her of "aiding and abetting those who seek the destruction of Israel."

Truth through information

From the editor's desk...

The malevolence underlying the protest by select celebrities against the spotlighting of Tel Aviv at the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) leaves one angry, once again, at the blatant prejudice that passes for impassioned morality among some

The protesters decried the fact that they did not want to be complicit in a propaganda campaign on behalf of the government of Israel, pointing to a previously announced effort by Israel's foreign ministry to "rebrand" the Jewish state as more than a place of conflict.

We know, however, given the well-know hostility toward Israel of the leaders of the protest, that the "rebranding" decision had absolutely nothing to do with the TIFF protest. TIFF's co-director Cameron Bailey, no staunchly proven supporter of Israel himself, unequivocally stated that the "rebranding" campaign played no role whatsoever in the decisions made by the festival.

TIFF was simply a conveniently timed, high profile, starlit event at which to bring forward the protesters' ideologically driven politics of demonizing the Jewish state on the way to its delegitimization in the international community. The "rebranding" campaign was a convenient pretext for their outcry, but not the reason for it. Witness the parallel efforts in Montreal, for example, to stop Leonard Cohen from performing in Israel.

But the protest leaves one worried as well as angry. Surely, not all the people who "sign on" to the cause wish to see the end of an independent, sovereign Jewish state, as do the deliberate propagators and reiterators of the vicious apartheid lie.

How can it be, we ask ourselves, that good, well-meaning people also simply adopt baseless, factless, hateful misinformation as truth?

They obviously know very little about the place and the people that exorcise their consciences to such an unthinking, herd-like frenzy. And yet, though they know nothing or next-to-nothing, they willingly join the malicious march to a destination that, God forbid, would forever and irremediably cleave the Jewish heart.

Ironically, the decision by TIFF to showcase the diverse artistry and rich sophistication of the Israeli film industry is vindication of the correctness of the decision to try to show the people of the world that Israel is vastly more than simply a place of conflict with the Palestinians.

That so many in the world do not know this – that they see Palestinians as the victims of an illegitimate Jewish will to national sovereign existence – is itself sad proof of the success of the propaganda campaign run these past decades by the Palestinian leadership and their supporters.

It is the Palestinian leaders and their supporters who have rebranded Israel, untruthfully, as oppressor and colonizer.

And so, it is today that Israel must try to seize back and replant the truth about itself in the minds of the ill-informed, unknowing people of the world.

Those celebrity artists, members of the world of theatre, arts and culture, who – out of their lack of knowledge – vilify Israel, might wish to know that the tiny country – population around seven million – is vibrant, dynamic, democratic and imperfect.

The Israeli film industry, some features of which were on display at TIFF, is but one of the details of the country's day-to-day, teeming, open, resplendent, diverse cultural life.

Indeed, some of the TIFF protesters might be interested to know that the Jerusalem Cinematheque – to name but one of countless cultural places in Israel – which sits on the edge of the Kidron Valley facing the walls of the Old City, brings together thousands of dedicated film lovers and casual film viewers of every age and every ethnic and religious background. It offers regularly scheduled screenings, special screenings and, of course, the annual International Film Festival for the benefit of all – Jew and Arab, Israeli and Palestinian, and tourists from all over the world – who wish to partake. The Cinematheque is also an educational centre for schoolchildren, students of cinema, educators of all backgrounds and ordinary members of the wide public.

Some TIFF protesters might also be interested to know that this summer, two musical events of extraordinary artistic power will be held at a place in Israel that is itself one of extraordinary power.

Giuseppe Verdi's emotional opera Nabucco will be performed on June 3 and 5, 2010, at Masada. Between the performances of the opera, on June 4, the renowned, Grammy Award-winning soprano Jessye Norman will give a concert featuring arias, lieder, folk songs and spirituals, at the imposing desert fortress.

I harbour no delusions about the TIFF protesters and their willingness to inform themselves about the true nature of life – including, or even especially, cultural life – in Israel. They are not really interested in the truth about the Jewish state. But those who are, should educate themselves. For information about the unending cultural activities in Israel, one can contact the Israel Government Tourism Office in Toronto at 416-964-3784. –MBD

McGuinty repledges $15M to Tomorrow Campaign

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty announced last week that his government will commit $15 million to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's $400-million Tomorrow Campaign.

But the money isn't new.

The grant was originally made in 2007, when it was revealed that it came from a $20-million fund that the opposition parties said had no formal application process and no published eligibility criteria, and that they said was being used to fund multicultural groups that were friendly to the Liberal party.

Federation spokesperson Howard English said that last week's announcement came after a report on the fund by the provincial auditor general cleared federation "of any wrongdoing," and in fact "praised the way in which we applied for [the money]."

Speaking in front of the new Lipa Green Centre on what is now called the Sherman Campus – located on Bathurst Street, between Sheppard and Finch avenues – McGuinty said he was representing 13 million Ontarians who will all benefit from the campaign.

Launched in April 2000 as the Jewish Toronto Tomorrow Initiative, the Tomorrow Campaign is a "gift to a country, to a province and a city that permitted us to flourish so vigorously," said Larry Tanenbaum, who along with Gerry Schwartz is the campaign co-chair.

He said the first phase of the campaign comprised the renovation of the downtown Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and the construction of the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Student Life at the University of Toronto.

The 27-acre Sherman Campus, where the press conference took place, "is in the midst of an exciting redevelopment."

Tanenbaum said the Prosserman Jewish Community Centre is part of the second phase of the Tomorrow Campaign, while the third component of the initiative, the 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, is also taking shape.

McGuinty said the new centres "represent the very best of Jewish traditions, values and beliefs," and he said his government decided to contribute $15 million to the project, because "it means, of course, more jobs today at a time when they are needed most and a better quality of life for years to come."

He said that since the building phase began in 2007, 200 construction jobs have been created.

"We are pleased and proud to participate in these initiatives. We support our Jewish community and we recognize your disproportionate influence for good," he told the gathering.

Among the notable attendees at last week's event was Health and Long-Term Care Minister David Caplan, MPPs David Zimmer, Greg Sorbara and Monte Kwinter, and the mayor of Eilat, Meir Yitzhak-Halevy and the mayor of Eilot, Udi Gat.

The mayors' appearance coincided with a trade conference last week in Toronto, in which Israeli companies from the Eilat area that specialize in low-emissions power technology were seeking investors. Eilat is also partnered with Toronto's Jewish community through federation's Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative.

In his remarks, McGuinty referred specifically to the Israeli mayors and said he plans to visit Israel, calling it a "model of perseverance and innovation.

"It is remarkable in terms of what has unfolded there, such a relatively new country, and its achievements," he added.

He said that the Tomorrow Campaign – which Tanenbaum boasted is the largest infrastructure project ever undertaken by a Canadian Jewish community and one of the largest in the Jewish world – is developing "places where we celebrate art, culture and learning, where we honour and remember the sacrifices of previous generations and where all are welcome."

McGuinty added that the Jewish community's commitment to ensuring its future as a thriving community reminded him of a quote by Rabbi Hillel, an ancient Jewish scholar, who said, "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? If I am not for others, what am I? And if not now, when?

"It also reminds me of something my father used to say… 'None of us is as strong as all of us working together'… The Jewish community has proven that sentiment to be true time and time again, and it seems there is nothing you cannot do when you put your minds to it."

Tanenbaum, who is also the chair of Maple Leaf Sports & Entertainment, said that almost all of the campaign funds raised to date – $400 million – have come from private sources and that the financial assistance provided by the provincial government will help the Jewish community realize "this remarkable dream."

McGuinty said that UJA Federation "is at the heart of this community, which is at the heart of this city, and when you are strong, we all stand strong together."

The premier was presented with a plaque from Federation as a thank-you for the grant. A plaque that recognizes the province's contribution to the initiative will also be hung on the "donor recognition wall" in the Lipa Green Centre, alongside plaques for other major contributors.

Dear Friends,

As we individually, and as a community, prepare ourselves for the holidays collectively known to us as the yamim nora'im – the days of awe – we take stock of the many challenges confronting Israel.

These challenges include the ongoing attempts to demonize and isolate Israel by those who deny to the Jewish people – and to Jewish people alone – what is granted to all other nations: to live as free people in our homeland.

We face an urgent international imperative of responding to Iran's impending capacity to implement its genocidal threats against Israel.

We face a critical need to educate and inform a younger Canadian demographic with limited knowledge of both the Christian narrative and the Jewish narrative upon which it is predicated.

We face the moral and existential obligation to re-engage our own young people in the inspiring narrative that is modern Zionism.

The coming year will be filled with intense work on these and many other issues. But the work will be conditioned by and predicated on a set of basic principles which are both incontrovertible and fundamental. We respectfully submit that every discussion of the conflict must explicitly include these central elements.

Israel is the aboriginal homeland of the Jewish people.

Zionism is the Jewish people's national liberation movement.

The single root cause of the conflict is ongoing rejection of Israel and its Jewish character. Everything else flows from that rejection.

Those who reject the special Jewish claim to Israel by definition deny the Christian narrative, central to Western civilization.

The debate over Israel is a struggle between moderation – which offers solutions and alternatives – and extremism, which offers none.

The extremists who oppose Israel have hijacked Western democratic institutions, including the UN and the international human rights agenda.

Israel has been and is always ready for peace.

Over the coming weeks and months, you'll be hearing about a series of initiatives focused on unmasking the profound dishonesty and cynicism behind the boycott Israel movement, and allowing you to take direct action to counter these efforts; you'll be hearing about what we together can do to draw attention to the urgent threat posed by Iran.

Until then, on behalf of the members of the CIC Board of Directors and Staff, I wish each of you a happy and healthy new year. Shana Tova. שנה טובה

The reference to "collective Jewish hand" is no mere statement of maudlin mush. It is a statement of fact. Each one of us through our involvement in and support of our respective communities, each United Jewish Appeal, each federation, ties into the rescue of the Ben Israel family like a super-strong safety skein catching co-religionists before they fall or are pushed into historical oblivion.

It's worth remembering this as we greet the New Year.

We are all individuals – autonomous, sentient beings. But we belong to a people – interconnected one to the other by common collective history, experience and memories.

It's worth remembering this as we hold the New Year's machzor in our hands, many of us standing in the tumult of large crowds of worshippers in our respective synagogues.

As Rabbi Philip Birnbaum wrote of the machzor more than six decades ago, "Phrased in plural form, the prayers are meant to be the voice of all Israel." He underscored the point of the inter-connectedness of the worshippers, of the peoplehood that enveloped all who looked to the High Holiday prayers, by noting that the machzor "embodies the visions and aspirations, the sorrows and joys of countless generations. The whole gamut of Jewish history may be traversed in its pages. The machzor is a mirror that reflects the development of the Jewish spirit throughout the ages... No other book so completely unites the dispersed of Israel."

Thus, when we hold the prayer book in our hands, it is no exaggeration to suggest, according to Rabbi Birnbaum, that we actually hold Jewish history in our hands.

But holding Jewish history is not quite like standing in Jewish history. We stand at the centre of that history every moment of every day when we proclaim in our hearts and say to the world that we do indeed belong to the Jewish People.

It is not through the gauzy mists of nostalgia that we look to our Judaism, to our sense of peoplehood. Rather, it is through the beckoning immediacy of present tense.

Peoplehood means responsibility. Responsibility means – among many other things – helping rescue the Ben Israel family from a country we have never seen for the sanctuary of a country that we will never forget nor ever let down.

This is a recurring theme that courses through the many writings of Rabbi Jonathan Sacks. "We are a people defined by history," he writes. "We carry our past with us. We relive it in ritual and prayer. We are not lonely individuals, disconnected with past and present. We are characters in the world's oldest continuous story, charged with writing its next chapter and handing it on to those come after us."

Even as we recite the Rosh Hashanah prayers, or skim them, or concentrate with extra focus on only a portion of them, we are indeed writing the next chapter of our history if we do so with the knowledge, gratitude and love that flows from knowing that our voices join with the voices, as Rabbi Birnbaum wrote, "of all Israel."

May we all be inscribed for a good year.

Day school funding

Shira Dicker's analysis of the crises in Jewish education today in her guest voice, "An inconvenient truth about day schools" (Sept. 10), is an interesting and poignant contrast to the rosier picture depicted in "Economy down, tuition subsidy requests up" (Sept. 3). Middle-class parents are, in fact, leaving the private day school system in greater numbers than ever before, leaving behind countless families who continue to suffer in silence and in shame from back-breaking, escalating tuition fees. This truth is an "inconvenient" and uncomfortable one for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and its benefactors, who prefer the "culture of affluence," showcasing, as they are wont to do, the excessive, concrete monuments of massive building complexes rather than focusing on the steadily mounting and unaffordable tuition fees that burden the rest of us. The growing trend of Jewish families defecting from the day school system should indeed be a wake-up call for us all.

Applauds film fest Tel Aviv programming

Kudos to Canadian filmmaker John Greyson, Naomi Klein, Jane Fonda and auspicious company for alerting me to the Toronto International Film Festival inaugural City to City Spotlight on Tel Aviv programming ("Film fest rejects celebrity protest," Sept. 10).

I anxiously look forward to seeing each one of these cinematic offerings, together with many others in the community who may have been unaware of this deserving event.

Needless to say we will miss Greyson's film offering dealing with homosexuality, which he withdrew in protest. Perhaps we can catch it at a Middle East film festival, excluding Israel, of course.

Celebrity protesters challenge TIFF

As a longtime supporter and admirer of the Toronto International Film Festival, I ask, how dare the "celebrity" protesters challenge TIFF with the intent to humiliate its non-partisan, reputable foundation ("Film fest rejects celebrity protest," Sept. 10)?

These like-minded celebrity activists, looking for a convenient cause to latch onto, spend too many of their waking hours pondering their anti-Israel epithets. For them not to evolve from this state of mental and moral stagnation preserves nothing but the perpetuation of hatreds at the expense of the rest of us, once again.

Montreal Y Shabbat opening

In "Montreal YM-YWHA to open on Shabbat" (Aug. 20), YM-YWHA executive director Michael Crelinsten says that the Y is already open to a limited extent on Shabbat, as it is home to two shuls that conduct morning services. This is very disingenuous, as it is well-known that attending services does not profane Shabbat, but exercising with equipment does.

In a report by the JCC Association, demographic data showed that the greatest determining factor in a Jewish community centre's policy whether to open on Shabbat was the strength of a community's Orthodox Jewish population. New York City, with the highest rate of Orthodox Jews, has the lowest rate of JCCs open on Shabbat (15 per cent). It is, therefore, completely unacceptable that Montreal's YM-YWHA disregard the voice of one of the most traditional Jewish communities in North America, with more than 90 per cent of Montreal's shuls being Orthodox, and force this new policy down our throats.

Furthermore, Crelinsten says that "the community has changed and continues to change." The Jewish General Hospital continues to serve everybody kosher food, even though the vast majority of its patients today are non-Jewish. This is because the hospital recognizes what the Y does not: its role and obligation as a communal institution to see to it that Jewish ritual be maintained.

Clock ticks for Iran as Israel appears ready for strike

By AMOS HAREL
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

In the rare moments when it's not preoccupied with the decline of U.S. President Barack Obama in the polls and with the debate over its government's proposed health-care reforms, the American press continues to deal almost obsessively with another pressing issue: the deadlock in efforts to stop Iran's nuclear program and the growing likelihood that the endgame will be an Israeli attack on Iran's nuclear facilities.

In the past few weeks alone, an editorial in the Wall Street Journal warned the president that the United States must put a quick halt to the Iranian nuclear program, otherwise Israel will bomb the facilities.

"An Israeli strike on Iran would be the most dangerous foreign policy issue President Obama could face," the paper wrote.

Former vice-president Dick Cheney revealed that while in office, he supported an American strike against Iran, but was compelled to accept the approach of president George W. Bush, who preferred the diplomatic route.

Another Republican ultra-hawk, former ambassador to the United Nations John Bolton, maintains that additional sanctions alone will not be enough to make the Iranians abandon their nuclear ambitions.

William Cohen, who served as secretary of defence during Bill Clinton's second presidential term (1997-2001), says that "there is a countdown taking place" and that Israel "is not going to sit indifferently on the sidelines and watch Iran continue on its way toward a nuclear weapons capability."

The chairman of the U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff, Adm. Mike Mullen, explains that "a very narrow window" exists between the possibility of resolving the issue and an attack on Iran.

An op-ed in the Los Angeles Times states (with some justification) that if Iran does not respond in September to the demands made of it, the world should brace itself for an Israeli attack. However, the author adds (mistakenly) that in the event of an Israeli strike, Obama "will probably learn of the operation from CNN, rather than the CIA."

This month will mark a critical juncture in Iran's race for nuclear capability. The timetable is getting ever shorter: Most western intelligence services share the assessment that over the course of 2010, Iran will accumulate sufficient fissionable material to produce two or three nuclear bombs. If the Iranians succeed in dispersing this material among a large number of secret sites, it will reduce the likelihood that the project can be stopped.

Even though Obama has now been in office for 7-1/2 months, Tehran has not responded to his offer to engage in direct dialogue about the nuclear issue.

At first the talks were deferred in anticipation of the Iranian presidential elections in June, then because of the internal crisis that erupted there in their wake, and now the regime is engaging in additional – and typical – delay tactics. Earlier this month, for the first time, Tehran announced readiness in principle to conduct negotiations with the international community.

The European Union appears to want to reach a decision on the subject ahead of the authorization of a fourth round of international sanctions against Iran, in the context of the G20 conference to be held in Pittsburgh in about two weeks. Israel is apprehensive that the Americans may delay a final decision until December.

The impression gained by Israelis who have visited Washington lately is that Obama is gradually backing away from the Bush administration's fundamental demand that Iran cease to enrich uranium as a precondition for beginning a dialogue.

Subsequently, they believe, the United States will offer Iran the following compromise: the Iranians will be allowed to enrich uranium for peaceful purposes (under tight international supervision), the previous sanctions imposed on Iran will be lifted and the two sides will reach understandings concerning Iran's interests in a number of arenas, notably Iraq, ahead of the planned withdrawal of U.S. troops from that country.

Obama would be able to present such an arrangement as an accomplishment. After all, before the election in November, he promised to prevent Iran from obtaining a nuclear bomb, not to force it to stop enriching uranium. From Israel's point of view, however, this will probably not be enough.

According to Maj.-Gen. (res.) Giora Eiland, former head of Israel's National Security Council, "The United States was ready to sign an agreement to that effect [last week]. The prospect that Iran will agree, despite the temptation of gaining international recognition for its right to enrich uranium, remains small."

In his view, "For its strategy to succeed, America needs a broad and binding international coalition. I still don't see them getting Russia and China to back such a move, and their support is essential."

Despite its fear that Iran will use the peaceful enrichment go-ahead to continue advancing secretly toward a bomb, Israel might, as a fallback position, accept such a compromise as long as it's clear that the international supervision is strong enough and that, in anticipation of the likely eventuality Iran will be found cheating, a broad coalition to toughen the sanctions is put together in advance.

If the dialogue fails, or never begins, more severe sanctions might be put into place: a ban on the purchase of oil from Iran and on the export of petroleum distillates to it, or even a maritime embargo. But the potential effectiveness of these moves, with Tehran already well past the halfway mark toward achieving its goal, is in doubt.

So, the moment of truth will arrive at some point between the end of 2009 and the middle of 2010: Should Iran be attacked? American experts agree that this would involve an Israeli strike. It's very unlikely that Obama will be the one dispatching American planes to Natanz.

During the past year, military experts and commentators are increasingly coming around to the view that the Israeli Air Force is capable of executing the mission. The Israel Defence Forces has been significantly upgraded during the tenure of Chief of Staff Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi. The goal, it is argued, is not to liquidate the Iranian project, but to set it back. According to this line of thought, if an attack, American or Israeli, causes a couple of years' delay in the project it will have achieved its aim. Similarly, before launching the attack on the Iraqi reactor in 1981, Israel didn't foresee the chain of events that finally forced Saddam Hussein to forgo his nuclear ambitions.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Defence Minister Ehud Barak take a similar view of the Iranian threat. At least, that is what both their public statements and their comments in closed meetings suggest.

For an Israeli attack to be considered, Israel would need the tacit approval of the Obama administration, if only in the sense that it looks the other way. This is due above all to the necessity of passing through the Iraqi air corridor, as American soldiers will still be in Iraq in 2011. No less important is strategic co-ordination for the day after: how will the United States react to a prolonged aerial attack by Israel on the nuclear sites and to the regional flare-up that might follow?

These are matters that would have to be agreed on directly between Obama and Netanyahu. The disparity in their policy stances, together with the total lack of personal chemistry between them, is liable to prove a hindrance.

Iran is likely to respond to an Israeli attack by opening fronts nearby, via Hezbollah from Lebanon and Hamas in Gaza. Three years after the Second Lebanon War and at the end of a broad process of learning lessons from that conflict, the IDF is quite confident of its ability to deal with Hezbollah. At the same time, it's clear that Israel will be subjected to extensive rocket attacks that can be expected to cover most of the country.

A key question would be Syria's behaviour. Israel has a salient interest in having Damascus be no more than a spectator in a confrontation. If the attack on Iran is perceived to have been successful, that's probably how the Syrians will respond.

But an attack on Iran will reopen a decades-old blood feud – and the Iranians have both a long memory and a great deal of patience. With decisions like this looming within a year, it's no wonder that Netanyahu wants to secure the return of Israel's kidnapped soldier, Gilad Schalit.

A decision to attack Iran would mean that the IDF bears central responsibility for resolving the nuclear threat. In the years when Mossad director Meir Dagan held former prime minister Ariel Sharon in his thrall (and even more so his successor, Ehud Olmert), the general belief was that the espionage agency could, together with political efforts, contain the Iranian nuclear project. And, indeed, if western intelligence services had to push back their forecasts repeatedly over the past decade regarding when the project would be completed, it's a safe bet that not all of Iran's delays were due to divine providence. At present, however, no action looms – other than an attack – that is capable of preventing Iran from achieving its goal.

It was the perfect picture: 50 rabbis praying on a plane. They were on a special charter flight over Israel, sounding the shofar in order to ward off H1N1.

Without prayer, Judaism is unthinkable, and one must appreciate how these rabbis wanted to protect the entire community. But even so, this flight disturbed me. When we emphasize an exotic form of prayer, we forget that in Judaism, using hand sanitizer is also a religious act.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Safety is a religious obligation. The Bible requires that a roof be properly gated to prevent people from falling off of it. Halachic authorities include in this commandment the responsibility to ensure occupational safety and an injunction against reckless driving.

So why are rabbis flying around in planes instead of handing out Purel dispensers?

Regrettably, this can be traced to a false dichotomy between the ritual and the ethical. Some people mistakenly see spiritual requirements such as kashrut as "true" Judaism and underemphasize Judaism's humane requirements. That's why some Orthodox Jews can be extremely punctilious about ritual commandments and at the same time smoke like chimneys and drive like maniacs.

Today, there is a new phenomenon behind this false dichotomy. Orthodox Jews are seen as long-bearded, exotic figures. In the Hollywood narrative, Orthodoxy is a group of rituals that make its adherents mysterious and unusual.

Unfortunately, many Orthodox Jews have adopted the Hollywood point of view and imagine that the primary purpose of Judaism is simply to be different. This is why mundane topics such as safety and ethics are neglected. After all, being ethical isn't all that exotic.

Of course, ethics are the foundation of Judaism. Yet this emphasis doesn't devalue the Torah's rituals. On the contrary: combined with ethics, ritual becomes part of a powerful, meaningful whole. Judaism isn't about being exotic, it's about being holy. Defining Judaism solely by being different turns us into caricatures of ourselves.

Many great rabbis understood this. Rabbi Yehuda Amital, the founder of the Meimad party in Israel, once said that if he was asked to join the Israeli cabinet, he would want to be minister of health, because Halachah demands that we be more stringent about health than any other religious requirement. The late Klausenberger Rebbe, Rabbi Yekusiel Yehuda Halberstam, made it his life's work to open a hospital in the city of Netanya. To these rabbis, safety and ethics were not at all secular concerns.

Safety is a religious issue, and health measures are the authentic Jewish response to H1N1. Thinking otherwise produces a movie-set Judaism that is both narrow-minded and empty.

As an academic, I like that my work year and the Jewish New Year begin together. As Jewish professors, administrators and students return to campus for a new academic year (and as some start afresh on their academic adventure), we should set some goals for effective pro-Israel advocacy and satisfying Jewish living.

Gil Troy in Montreal

These truly are the best and the worst of times on campus for Jews. There have never been so many Jewish students and staffers, or so many Jewish studies programs and vital Hillels. Unfortunately, this Golden Age is also an era of systematic demonization of Israel on campus. The challenge here is to keep perspective. Our delight in the comfort Jews have in the academic world should not blind us to the ugliness of the anti-Israel assault. Our bitterness at the attacks' toxicity should not sour us on the joys of academic life. Neither complacency nor paranoia works. We must celebrate Israel as well as defend Israel. We must focus on Jewish life and not let our enemies set the agenda.

In forging an effective campus strategy to defend and delight in Judaism and Zionism, consider the following guidelines:

• Israel's culture is vital and infectious, an appealing mix of the East and the West. We should change the stereotype of "Israel the warrior state." Students – and professors – should see the Israel that Madonna recently saw, the Israel of a modern rock beat and of ancient wisdom, the Israel of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem.

• Never attack academic freedom, but never tolerate educational malpractice. I wholeheartedly support professors' freedoms to draw whatever conclusions they can from their assessment of evidence, but I reject the way too many professors abuse their podiums. If a professor refuses to air opposing views, mocks students who disagree, or turns the lecturer's stand into a political soapbox, students should document it carefully, get corroborating witnesses, ask the professor to stop and contact administrators, parents, alumni and community leaders if the complaints are ignored.

• Let's delegitimize the delegitimizers. For too long, we have allowed those using the "racism" and "apartheid" slanders to carry the day. We must be proactive, pointing out that singling out Israel, rationalizing Palestinian terrorism, drawing false analogies with the evil South African regime and making libelous comparisons to Nazis puts Israel's critics in league with Arab anti-Semites and outdated Soviet propagandists. The moral onus is on them to prove they are not anti-Semitic or abetting anti-Semitism by distancing themselves from the exterminationists and hate-mongers.

• Don't fear the Z-word. Too many Jews on campus have internalized the critics' lies and fear using the word "Zionism." Those who have visited Israel on Birthright Israel or other programs should learn that Zionism is another name for all those warm glowy feelings they have about Israel – that sense of peoplehood and appreciation for a Jewish state.

• We need a big-tent Zionism. Our anger at the unreason of too many of Israel's accusers shouldn't shut our minds down. We should welcome a wide spectrum of opinions and voices, making it clear that we can disagree graciously about settlements, boundaries, strategies, even values, without demonizing or delegitimizing. There is a rich Israeli and Jewish tradition of dissent that should not be squelched. Only when people start attacking Israel disproportionately, inaccurately and with the language of those who seek its extermination should we react strongly. Beyond that, our Jewish centres should be centres of creative, vital and diverse thought and argument.

• Lo nafseek lirkod (We won't stop dancing or singing or learning or praying or enjoying…). Outside the closed Dolphinarium, the Tel Aviv disco where a terrorist – later glorified by Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat – slaughtered 21 teenagers and wounded 120, a simple monument promises defiantly: "Lo nafseek lirkod (We won't stop dancing)." Our enemies cannot defeat us or demoralize us.

Universities should be centres of Jewish revival, places where students and professors discover the spiritual, intellectual, ideological depth of the Jewish experience. We should embrace Judaism, engage Israel, learn Torah, appreciate Jewish civilization and never, ever stop singing and dancing. Shanah tovah.

Let's try to be mitzvah maniacs

Danny Siegel is a mitzvah maniac. I've never met anyone else in my life who is so single-minded about tzedakah, so driven to do deeds of lovingkindness, so successful at inspiring others that bar mitzvah kids sponsor used carseat drives for needy mothers and collect sports equipment for the local shelter before he even finishes a speech. (See www.dannysiegel.com.)

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein in Jerusalem

I had the privilege during my first week in Jerusalem to spend four days with him, going from tzedakah project to tzedakah project, meeting the people he calls "mitzvah heroes," gleaning onions in a field dedicated to the poor; getting blessings from a rebbetzin who furnishes hundreds of poor brides with wedding gowns, and walking therapeutic dogs that are used in therapy with dysfunctional families (they're helpful in getting people to open up and share or reveal things).

We gave out muffins at 7 a.m. in the Central Bus Station to soldiers returning to their bases. We studied rabbinic texts on tzedakah and discussed the differences between charity and compassion. We learned how balloon animals can make a traumatized child smile.

I thought a lot during those four days about the upcoming High Holidays. I thought about how when we approach taking stock of our lives, we often use this time to count our blessings and to make "New Years resolutions" to change the world. I thought a lot about my own role as a community leader. Do I do as much as I get others to do? Do I give as much as I get others to give? Could I ever be a "mitzvah maniac" with a daily routine of feeding the hungry, clothing the naked and breaking the chains of the bound?

Indeed the very focus of the Haftarah of Yom Kippur is Isaiah's plea to the people of Israel to stop relying on sacrifices and ritual and to start practising deeds of goodness and tzedakah as the "gateway" to the Divine.

As a rabbi, I often hear people say, "I am a good person, which makes me a good Jew." That statement, I thought, was made in order to avoid having to practise ritual and to get "mitzvah credit" for things such as being kind to animals and walking old ladies across the street. I used to think that was "Boy Scout Judaism," equating doing good deeds with doing Jewish deeds. I admit that I looked down on that kind of thinking.

But after four days with a mitzvah maniac, I feel differently. Being a good Jew should automatically mean being a good person. I wish we had more Boy Scout do-gooder Jews.

As we approach the High Holidays, it's easy to become narcissistic with all the self-reflection we are supposed to practise and all the looking inward we are supposed to do. What I discovered from these mitzvah heroes is that actually tzedakah is not about "selflessness" but the opposite. It's about extending the notion of self to radically include others. If "self" means my family, too, then it also means my community, my neighborhood, my synagogue, my school, my world and my planet.

People with a wider definition of "me" and "mine" are committed to neighbours and community. The mitzvah heroes I met had a very broad notion of self, including as many people as possible. Their neighbour's problems are theirs. Their city's problems are theirs. Their planet's problems are theirs. Their "me" is "we."

Every Yom Kippur, I feel so inadequate during the Avinu Malkeinu prayer when I sing "ki ain banu maasim" – "though we have no actions, be kind to us." I know it's true. So few of us have changed the world, even a little. So many of us want to, but we get lost during the year, busy with our mortgages and work and the million little things that take up our time. But if we could just try, this year, to be mitzvah maniacs, we'd be on our way to being really good Jews.

Poland and Israel have formed strong relations

History takes strange turns as yesterday's enemies morph into today's friends. There is no better example of this dictum than Poland's current relationship with Israel, which the president of Poland, Lech Kaczynski, has described as "special."

Sheldon Kirshner in Warsaw

During the Six Day War, however, the Polish communist regime broke off ties with Israel after branding it as an aggressor. Poland's position was in line with the Soviet Union and its allies in eastern Europe.

Poland resumed full diplomatic relations with Israel in 1990, less than a year after the fall of Poland's communist government and three years after Poland and Israel began mending fences by agreeing to establish low-level ties.

Today, Poland, like Germany, has become one of Israel's best friends in the European Union. "Our relations are based on a thousand years of shared history," Kaczynski observed while visiting Israel in 2006. "Poland relates to Israel as a country in which Poland has a special interest." Returning the compliment on a trip to Poland last year, Shimon Peres, Israel's president, called Poland one of Israel's closest friends in Europe. Israel's former ambassador to Poland, David Peleg, declared, "Poland is a partner."

Israel's newly installed ambassador, Zvi Rav-Ner, who was born in Poland, is fluent in Polish and was charge d'affairs at the Israeli embassy when full relations were restored 19 years ago, characterized bilateral relations as "very friendly."

Israel's embassy in Warsaw is located in a leafy residential neighbourhood where the Jewish musician and composer Wladyslaw Szpilman hid from the Nazis during the Holocaust and whose struggle was the subject of Roman Polanski's stirring film, The Pianist.

In an interview, Rav-Ner said that Israel and Poland share a similar perspective on almost all important issues, from terrorism to Iran's nuclear program, and both are close to the United States.

"Poland is definitely one of the European Union countries very strongly supportive of Israel's right to secure borders and fighting terrorism." But since it is bound by EU Mideast policy, Poland has subscribed to policies that have been critical of Israel, such as its construction of settlements in the West Bank. Still, as Rav-Ner noted, Poland, along with Germany and the Czech Republic, are moderating forces in the EU. "We can rely on this country," he said of Poland.

He cited a case in point: While some EU members link an upgrade of ties with Israel to progress in the bumpy peace process, Poland has supported enhanced relations with Israel on its own merits. Visiting Israel last year, Polish Prime Minister Donald Tusk and his Israeli counterpart, Ehud Olmert, announced an upgrading of relations. By no accident, Tusk's visit coincided with the inauguration of a "Polish year" in Israel, during which cultural relations were deepened.

In every key sector, Israel's relationship with Poland is flourishing, though tensions have been stoked by Poland's failure thus far to return private Jewish properties seized since World War II and by the inclusion of a far right-wing party with anti-Semitic inclinations in the government coalition in 2006.

The annual volume of trade, as expressed in U.S. currency, is about $530 million. In 2008, it was tilted in Israel's favour, but of late, it has been quite balanced. Machinery, high-tech products, metals, chemicals and food are among the goods that flow back and forth. Israel also sells military equipment – including Spike anti-tank missiles and day/night vision systems– to Poland, which is modernizing its armed forces. "There are all sorts of things going on," said Rav-Ner. "Poland needs the best possible equipment and Israel can supply some of it."

As well, Israel and Poland have formed strategic ties. When Poland's defence minister paid a visit to Israel two years ago, he said he hoped that Polish air force pilots could train in Israel and that Poland and Israel would co-operate against terrorism.

Israeli investors have poured about $3 billion into Poland, primarily in real estate developments. Scientific co-operation is on the upswing, as are academic and youth exchanges.

Cultural exchanges are expanding, and in an attempt to solidify relations, state-run Polish Radio has begun broadcasting news in Hebrew. Last year, 170,000 Poles, mainly Christian pilgrims, visited Israel, while about 100,000 Israelis visited Poland. The national carriers, El Al and Lot Polish Airlines, service both markets.

Maciej Kozlowski

According to Rav-Ner, the Polish media tends to be pro-Israel. When Israel invaded the Gaza Strip last winter to silence Hamas rockets, the Polish press displayed an understanding attitude. "The basic line was that Israel has a right to defend itself," he said.

Konstanty Gebert, a prominent Polish journalist, said, "There is genuine support for Israel as an embattled nation." The chief rabbi of Poland, Michael Schudrich, believes that Poles have "a deep respect" for Israel as a nation that can defend itself.

"The past is always present in Poland's relations with Israel," commented Maciej Kozlowski, Poland's ambassador to Israel from 1999 to 2003 and now deputy director of the foreign affairs ministry's Africa and Middle East department.

Delivering an upbeat assessment of Polish-Israeli relations, he said, "For us, Israel is not a country like any other. It was founded and established by Poles, especially during the Third Aliyah. These people, from David Ben-Gurion onward, created the modern state of Israel and its political system.

"Out of 120 Knesset members in 1949, 100 spoke Polish. Balagan, coalitzia and protekzia are Polish words. There was strong Polish support for the creation of Israel. Poland basically supported the partition of Palestine and Poland immediately recognized Israel's independence. Czech arms were shipped through Polish ports, and many (Jewish) fighters in the 1948 war had Polish military training. After 1989, Poland secretly permitted Soviet Jewish immigrants to travel to Israel through Poland. Our biggest embassy in the Middle East is in Israel."

A former journalist who married an Israeli woman of Polish origin while serving in Israel, he said he cannot understand why Poland severed relations with Israel in 1967. "We had no quarrels." Behind closed doors, senior government officials were pleased that Israel had defeated Soviet-supplied Arab armies, he noted. They said, 'Our Jews are fighting their Arabs.'"

Seguing to Poland's current relations with Israel, he said, "They are flourishing and really good." Kozlowski, who wears another hat as Poland's ambassador-at-large for Jewish relations, said there is "a strong reservoir of sympathy" for Israel in central Europe and particularly in Poland. "We understand the existential threat to Israel, due to our historical situation at having been on the brink of extinction," he said, referring to Poland's partition in the 18th century, the Nazi occupation and the Soviet Union's domination. "France and Sweden can't understand that. We understand that Israel has to take measures that may look harsh but are necessary. We understand much better the realities of the Middle East."

Poland – which has sent peacekeeping troops to the Golan Heights, southern Lebanon and Iraq and currently stations some 2,000 troops in Afghanistan – maintains cordial relations with the Arab world, the Palestinian Authority and Iran.

"We have normal relations with Iran, though not strong commercial ties like Germany. We're very much worried by Iran's nuclear program, but our major problem with Iran is its president's Holocaust denial. It's something totally unacceptable."

To our valued clients "L'Shanah Tova".

Rosh Hashanah marks the beginning of a new year. We go to shul and hear the sounds of the shofar. We review our mistakes, cast off our sins, and resolve to do better in the coming year. We spend time with family and cherished friends.

To the 1800 investors of the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund, the large majority being Jewish, we wish you continued success and good health. From Arthur, Mark, Wes, Blake, Shelly and our entire staff, "L'Shanah tova tikatev v'taihatem – May you be inscribed and sealed for a good year."

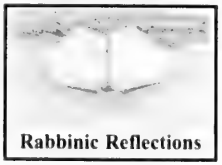
Renew our days as of old

By RABBI DANIEL GOTTLIEB



As we move from the final days of Elul into the New Year, the words of the ancient prayer find their way to our hearts: Hashiveinu HaShem Eilecha v'nashuvah – Return us O God to You and we shall return; chadesh yameinu kekedem – renew our days as of old.

Our prayer is two-fold: help us to return to the path of righteousness from which we have strayed in the year that is ending; and make our days like they used to be. While we have been engaged in the introspection and atonement that marks the month of Elul, with the sound of the shofar already in our ears and words of Slichot already spoken, who among us is not engaged in hopeful prayer that the year ahead will be one that restores to us the sense of well-being and security of years past?

The year that is ending, 5769, will be remembered as a year of economic hardship and uncertainty for many people. Loss of savings, less money for those living on fixed incomes, unemployment, hunger and homelessness have been experienced throughout our community. We have been forced to learn how to live with less wealth, and to do without some of what we used to use to measure our success in life. For many of us, we have had to ask: "How much is enough?" And I believe that for all of us, we will need in the year ahead to find new measures of identity and success. It is time for us to replace materialistic measures with spiritual abundance and social capital.

In her book Claiming the Earth as Common Ground (Skylight Paths Publishing, 2009), Andrea Cohen-Kiener writes, "In the Jewish tradition, we say that kindness (social exchange) is greater than charity (financial gifts). Kindness can be exchanged between rich and poor; it is class blind. Kindness can be offered to the living and the dead because kindness does not require compensation. We cannot eat kindness, but we can be fed by kind people."

Cohen-Kiener argues for a return to the biblical models of wealth and social wealth, for a return to the value of community, in which everyone contributed to the well-being of everyone else. How a people treats its most vulnerable is the true measure of its greatness. That is why the Torah continually reminds us of our obligation to the poor, the widow, the orphan and the stranger, and that we were, ourselves strangers in the land of Egypt.

In ancient times, seasonal tithes and gifts, gleaning in the corner of the field, low-interest loans, release from debt and return of ancestral land-holdings in the Jubilee year, all allowed for the restoration and renewal of individuals who had fallen into the ranks of the poor. Perhaps it is time for us to increase our social wealth and make it the measure of our success, for the year 5770 and for our future.

To this ancient model of caring community we can turn. It is for just such a model of caring community that we can pray. This is, indeed, the renewal we envision and seek when we speak the ancient words: Chadesh yameinu kekedem – Renew our days as of old.

The importance of empathy

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

There are many things we know about Rosh Hashanah almost automatically.

We anticipate family feasts together. We look forward to apples dipped in honey and challahs bursting with sweet raisins, as well as a new fruit, a new dish served and traditional Jewish cooking.

We know that going to shul is on the horizon, where we again see the families that usually sit around us and marvel at how children have grown and changed. Sadly, we become aware of some empty seats around us that were filled in previous years. All of these things merely provide the context within which the meaning of Rosh Hashanah begins to affect us.

There's so much around us to be grateful for, so much we don't deserve and so many choices to reflect upon while realizing the stakes for benefit and loss could not be higher or more present at our doorstep.

Within this context of gain and loss, joy and trepidation, the prayers begin, and the plea for Divine compassion starts to layer the pages of the machzor.

Every human being would pray for compassion if their lives and the lives of their loved ones were at stake. There isn't anyone who wouldn't seize the moment to ensure safety and prosperity. Yet, oftentimes, the words of the prayers can ring hollow to us, and the moment can lose its reality and perhaps someone will miss their opportunity.

The sages have spoken of and recorded many of these reflections throughout the Talmud and midrash. What is it that can make our plea for compassion a real one? How can we possibly understand the grandeur of the moment of Rosh Hashanah?

An interesting consistency begins to appear through the sages' reflections on these questions. The attribute of empathy, not sympathy, moves to the forefront.

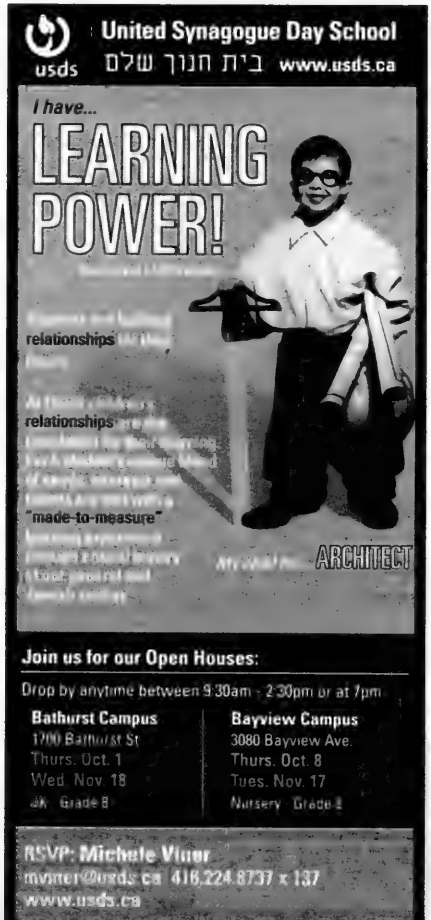
One would think that the Divine Court would respond to the strategies employed in a human court. Once someone has been found guilty, they can throw themselves on the mercy of the court and hope for a compassionate sentence. On the High Holidays, we stand before God and admit our crimes. There is no question of our guilt. We implore God to be merciful, but we don't throw ourselves upon Divine Mercy and hope for the best.

On the contrary. The sages have taught us that the person who can pray for compassion is the person who has shown compassion. The person who can ask for forgiveness is the person who can practise forgiveness. To speak with God about granting kindness, one must have empathized with hearing that plea. Imagine hearing the appeal of one person and scrutinizing our response. Now imagine, as it were, hearing the appeals of hundreds of millions throughout time.

According to the midrash, before you ask for God's compassion, be compassionate to your fellow human beings. Throughout the biblical story of Job, with all his sufferings, he's only granted a response when he prays for his friends. During Rosh Hashanah, we read of Sarah's pregnancy and we remember that she conceives a child once Abraham offers a prayer for Abimelech, an innocent victim.

There's no lack of opportunity for a single act of compassion in our daily lives. We will stand in shul this year with the machzor open, and the sages would probably have approved if we were to each take a moment to remember a single act of compassion and reflect on what it meant – how we grew because of that moment and how we can repeat that reaction.

Only through understanding compassion can we sincerely ask for God to extend it.



Jewish Life

Hellenism and the Jews

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

The relationship between Israel and the ancient Aegean, the homeland of Greeks, has been a tumultuous one. Some have even seen a tenuous link between the two civilizations as early as the time of the Exodus, if not before. The earliest verifiable contact between the two cultures is in the period right after the Exodus, during the time of the conquest of Canaan and the days of the Judges.

At that time, circa 1200 BCE, as Israel was entering the Promised Land from the east, another group was invading from the west. This was the time of the mass migration of the Sea Peoples, who are mentioned in Egyptian texts. Among them there was a group called the Peleshet, whom we know as the Philistines. The struggle between the two peoples was a long, drawn-out affair lasting more than two centuries, until the final defeat of the Philistines by David.

But there would be other meetings between the Greeks and our ancestors. However, none was more long lasting than that brought about by the conquests of Alexander the Great in the fourth century BCE. Not only did Alexander add Israel to his empire but he also introduced Greek culture throughout the lands he had conquered from the Persians.

Persian rule had been benevolent for our people. In fact, it was the Persians who freed the Jews from captivity in Babylon when they conquered that fabled city under their great ruler, Cyrus, in 538 BCE. Cyrus and the Persians allowed the Jews to return to their homeland in Israel and to begin rebuilding the Temple.

A number of scholars have helped to illuminate the Persian Period. One of the most prominent is Prof. Ephraim Stern, from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. He was the head of the university's Institute of Archaeology and wrote a number of works on this little-known period of the history of ancient Israel. Among these works is a masterful archeological survey of the period, basing some of its conclusions on the discoveries Stern made while he was director of the Tel Dor excavations in the 1980s.

There is strong archeological evidence of Greek contact with Israel even during the Persian Period. At sites such as Tel Dor, remains of Greek-inspired statuary has been found, while Greek coins, especially those from Athens, were already the preferred medium for international trade. But the conquests of Alexander would unleash a flood of Greek influence on the region. After Alexander's death and the division of his empire, Israel would seesaw between the Seleucids of Syria and the Ptolemies of Egypt, until it finally remained part of the Seleucid dominions.

Already Jews were succumbing to the seductive sway of Greek culture. Indeed Alexandria, which was founded by Alexander as an ideal Geek polis, or city, had a large Jewish population that some have said made up as much as a quarter of the city's total inhabitants. Assimilation was so great among this group that the Tanach had to be translated into Greek. This was the first time that our Bible was translated into another language. The great American Jewish scholar, Louis Finkelstein, has even suggested that Greek philosophical influence, especially the study of logic, played a role in the development of Talmudic logic.

Not all Jews were seduced by Greek culture. Some resisted the strong pull of assimilation, especially when the Seleucid king, Antiochus IV Epiphanes, tried to desecrate the Temple in Jerusalem by putting a statue of Zeus in it.

His actions would spark the Maccabean Revolt, which has given us the holiday of Chanukah. But despite our victory against the Seleucids, an even greater danger was looming on the horizon. The legions of Rome were on the march, and they would cast an ominous shadow over ancient Israel.

Rosh Hashanah foods

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

The Passover seder has matzah and maror. Purim has hamantashen. Shavuot has cheesecake. But what about Rosh Hashanah? While ushering in the Jewish New Year, we grace our table with apples, honey and some of the sweetest dishes of the Jewish calendar.

Actually, Passover isn't the only holiday with a seder. On the first night of the Rosh Hashanah, we eat a series of foods whose Hebrew names have dual meanings. For example, the Hebrew word for black-eyed peas – "rubia" sounds like the Hebrew word for increase "yirbu." So when the peas are eaten, the following prayer is recited: "May it be the will of our Heavenly Father that our merits increase." [tinyurl.com/rosh001]

Other foods in the Rosh Hashanah seder include carrots, fenugreek, beets, dates and gourds. We (famously) eat apples and honey so "that You renew us for a good and sweet year," and (less famously) dine on the head of a fish or sheep so "that we be as the head and not as the tail." [tinyurl.com/rosh002]

There are plenty of sites bursting with New Year's recipe suggestions. You can try a Turkish Rosh Hashanah menu with Pan de Calabraza (Pumpkin Bread) and Kefles de Prasa (Leek Croquettes). [tinyurl.com/rosh003] Mimi's Cyber Kitchen will tempt you with Beef Brisket with Onion, Lemon Marmalade and a sinful (perhaps I shouldn't use that word in this article) Chocolate Babka. [tinyurl.com/rosh004]

The Rosh Hashanah Recipe Index boasts more than 100 suggestions with everything from Anise Bread (Khboz from Morocco) to Zimstern (a spicy cookie). [tinyurl.com/rosh005]

About half the 130 Rosh Hashanah recipes at Kosherdelight.com are in Hebrew (fish in a piquant sauce) with the remainder in English (orange-scented mandelbrot). [tinyurl.com/rosh006]

If you prefer to enjoy your holiday meals without meat, you may want to pick up the Jewish Vegetarian Year Cookbook by Roberta Kalechofsky and Rosa Rasiel. You can read a review of the cookbook and sample two of their offerings: Mock Chopped Liver and Van Gogh's Potatoes. [tinyurl.com/rosh008] There's a lively discussion board at the Chowhound site about vegetarian faves for the holiday. [tinyurl.com/rosh009] And Richard Schwartz suggests that now is the ideal time to switch to a meatless diet. "While we implore 'our Father, our King' on Rosh Hashanah to 'keep the plague from thy people,' high fat, meat-based diets are causing a plague of degenerative diseases." [tinyurl.com/ rosh010]

The Gems in Israel site points out that the shape of Rosh Hashanah dishes is also significant: round shapes represent wholeness and continuity. Round challahs, of course, are a familiar treat. "The roundness is also present in the apple, dipped in honey, which is served as an opening to the meal, and in the round Kreplach that are served with the soup." [tinyurl.com/rosh014]

This year, on the second afternoon of Rosh Hashanah, Jews will go to a nearby stream or body of water to perform the ritual of Tashlich. Prayers are recited and sins are symbolically tossed into the depths. Some people even shake out the hems of their clothing while others toss breadcrumbs into the waters. [tinyurl.com/rosh011]

With that in mind, here's a tongue-in-cheek look at the custom. "Taking a few crumbs on Rosh Hashanah to throw into the water for the Tashlich ceremony from whatever old bread is in the house lacks subtlety, nuance and religious sensitivity. Instead, this coming Rosh Hashanah consider these options. [tinyurl.com/rosh012]

- For ordinary sins, use white bread
- For immodest dressing, tarts
- For causing injury or damage to others, tortes
- For committing car theft, caraway
- For substance abuse, stoned wheat
- For sins of pride, puff pastry
- For unfairly upbraiding another, challah

Warning: Since I first mentioned this site several years ago, the list has lengthened and the puns have worsened! [tinyurl.com/rosh013]

Enjoy your soul food and have a very happy and healthy year.

Jewish Life

The negative teaches us about the positive

Rosh Hashanah Message

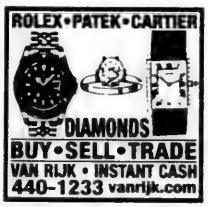
By MARK J. FREIMAN

The period leading up to Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is traditionally a time for reflection and self-examination throughout the Jewish community.

This year we have had a lot to reflect on. Violence in the Middle East and a worldwide downturn in the economy have consistently served as reliable harbingers for a resurgence of anti-Semitism, and the past year has certainly lived down to such expectations.

Though we live in a mainly tranquil and generous country, Canada has not been exempt from this baleful phenomenon, as the ugliness of the so-called "Israeli Apartheid Week" on our campuses or the recent push by elements within the United Church of Canada to boycott Israel clearly attest.

Although their orchestrators may seek refuge under the borderline respectability of the euphemism "anti-Zionism," the real nature of these initiatives is never far from the surface. The "anti-apartheid" campus warriors search out students wearing yarmulkes or featuring Magen Davids on their necklaces to harass and intimidate. The resolutions denouncing Israel are supported by materials alleging corruption and disloyalty against Canadian Jews who support the Jewish state.

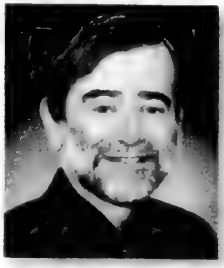


If we focus only on this rise of anti-Semitic initiatives, our reflections are likely to be troubled and may lead, unnecessarily, to discouragement.

Anti-Semitism is clearly a great negative, but it is worth invoking a familiar rabbinic principle of interpretation: "Miklal lav ata shome'a hain" – "The negative teaches you about the positive."

There is nothing positive about anti-Semitism, but there is plenty of positive to be taken from the fight against it.

One of the most positive recent developments in this regard is the decision by politicians representing all parties in the House of Commons to join under the banner of the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Antisemitism and call a parliamentary inquiry into anti-Semitism so as to adopt recommendations to help fight it.



Mark J. Freiman, national president, Canadian Jewish Congress

This realization by our parliamentarians that anti-Semitism is a Canadian issue parallels the approach that Canadian Jewish Congress has taken throughout the 90 years of its distinguished existence, an approach that emphasizes both adjectives in its name – specifically, that the fight against anti-Semitism invokes values that are simultaneously Canadian and Jewish.

This is not a trivial point.

Correctly understood, the fight against anti-Semitism does not involve a search for pity or a cry of victimization. Nor is it a plea from a subordinate group directed to a dominant culture.

To the contrary: the fight against anti-Semitism is an affirmation of positive values that lie at the heart of Canadian society as much as it is a defence of Jewish identity.

The very core of Canadian society and its values is our Constitution and its entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The central vision of the Charter is a universal entitlement to human rights and civil liberties. Its message is that all who live here are entitled to opportunities based on their own merits and not on the place they came from, the group they belong to, the religion they profess or their gender, sexuality or physical challenges. We may be judged, but we are each to be judged by what we as individuals do, not on stereotypes of who we are.

This is, of course, the polar opposite of the vision of anti-Semitism.

Anti-semites are interested in judging individuals so as to reinforce their stereotypes of the group. They search for faults, real or imagined, in individual Jews or in Israel merely as illustrations of the proposition that there is something intrinsically wrong or bad about Jews in general or about a Jewish state.

It is no coincidence that the most virulent of contemporary anti-Semitic ideologies, the so-called "Islamist" ideology professed by Al Qaeda and its fellow travellers, identifies as examples of evil "Jewish" ideas and values such concepts as democracy, women's rights, and a "corrupting" cosmopolitan culture.

Miklal lav ata shome'a hain? "The negative teaches you about the positive."

As we reflect on the year gone by, I invite you to join Canadian Jewish Congress in advancing the positive values we share as Canadians and as Jews.

I also invite you to accept the heartfelt wishes of Congress and of my family and me personally. L'Shanah Tovah Tikateivu v'Tichateimu.

Mid-rise apartment style buildings in cottage country work on paper, but will not fly. The boomers have also snubbed the new sprawling subdivision-style Lifestyle Communities adjacent to golf courses because they lack waterfront and require cars. Waterfront Lifestyle Communities featuring townhomes are sitting idle because the boomers don't want the stairs.

Signature Carleton, whose background is in hotels, resorts and million dollar estates, appears to have found the right formula with it's latest release, Sophie's Landing Lakeside Club in Orillia. Sophie's Landing is a Gated Waterfront Lifestyle Community located on the north shores of Lake Simcoe, in the Trent Severn Waterway System.

Sophie's Landing, now rated Ontario's #1 Lifestyle Community, is the only gated waterfront community in Ontario. It features very high-end architecture and has received 2 urban design awards to date.

Eric Kerzner, president of Signature Carleton, set his sights squarely on this exploding cohort when he conceived Sophie's Landing. He is directly targeting boomers in their late 40's, 50's and early 60's who are looking for a cottage they can ultimately use as a summer home or full time retirement residence.

Sophie's Landing features 84 detached bungalows with lofts, steep rooflines, full basements and attached garages. All units have a single or double drive.

Bruce Light, a Phase 2 Purchaser told us "We researched everything within 90 minutes of Toronto. Nothing compared to Sophie's Landing. This location is ideal. We appreciated that the developer was willing to customize our home. He promised us a first class development and spared no expense on the quality of our home & the amenities, including Private Marina, Waterfront Clubhouse and Pool. We feel we made a very good investment and the quality of our lifestyle is everything we dreamed it would be."

Purchasers at Sophie's Landing are encouraged to customize their homes. Kerzner has created a cost + 20% formula that makes it doable.

Louis Weisleder, who bought his cottage in Phase 1 points out "We looked everywhere before stumbling upon Sophie's Landing. The purchasers here are happy. They love their homes and the lifestyle here. We've made so many friends. And where else can you sit with the developer to design your dream home? We get so much positive feedback about our home and about the architecture here, and our amenities. We feel we've made an excellent investment."

Jeff Rubenstein, another Phase 2 Purchaser said "We have been looking for a cottage for 5 years and we are just so happy with our investment here at Sophie's Landing." "This builder has a great concept, and understands how to deliver customer service, which is a scarce quality among home builders these days. He has also been quite clever about attracting the right kind of buyers. We are making many new friends. They all value their lifestyles, just like us," says Rubenstein.

Anyone interested in Sophie's Landing should move quickly. Phase 1 (49 units) is sold-out. Phase 2 (35 units) is 90% sold. Prices start at $339,900 with sizes up to 3,000 sq ft. Purchasers who move quickly will receive a Free Upgrade Package valued at $33,000 and will save up to $20,000 in the new Harmonized Sales Tax (HST).

Chuck Penny lives in Phase 1 and now sells for Kerzner. Penny says "compare our condo fees of $125/month to our competitor's $0.33 per sq ft and I can show you how you need to add $250,000 to their prices to compare apples to apples due to our condo fees alone."

Penny adds "Orillia has Memorial Hospital, shopping & festivals every summer weekend. Casino Rama and downtown Orillia are 5 minutes from our gates. We have a 65 acre park with trails and beaches right across the street."

Ignatieff 'acutely aware' of Iranian threat to Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Liberal leader Michael Ignatieff says he understands Israel's fears about Iran acquiring nuclear weapons.

Speaking to about 50 members of the National Ethnic Press and Media Council of Canada last week at a downtown Toronto hotel, Ignatieff said his party has been "front and centre" on this issue.

"In fact, [Liberal MP and former justice minister] Irwin Cotler, has taken a lead on this issue and just recently met with [South African President Jacob] Zuma to talk to him about Iran," he added, in response to a question from The CJN about how a Liberal government would confront a belligerent and nuclear-capable Iran.

"We are trying to mobilize the international community... and we've been pioneers in defending the [nuclear] non-proliferation act."

Michael Ignatieff

Ignatieff also said that after recent meetings in Israel with "top Israeli advisers," he was "acutely aware" of Israeli angst about Iran and the existential threat it poses to the Jewish state with its burgeoning nuclear capability, coupled with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's repeated public threats to annihilate Israel.

"Our position is that Iran is playing with fire in the region," he said.

In between speaking about what a Liberal government would do to strengthen the economy – he said he'd aggressively court China and India to "hitch" Canada to their "booming" economies – and how it would implement strategy on the potential impact of Iranian nuclear weapons in the Middle East, he repeated his pledge to trigger an election as soon as possible.

"We no longer have confidence in the government. We will introduce a motion of non-confidence in the government," Ignatieff said when questioned about his timing on the issue.

Ignatieff also addressed issues of concern to Canadians of almost all ethnic communities, including visa reform for Iranian immigrants; the need for Arctic diplomacy and talks with other Arctic nations; having "frank discussions" with China's leaders on human rights issues; protection for Canadian citizens travelling abroad, and the importance of recognizing the contributions of Canada's many multicultural communities.

"Never forget, my name is Ignatieff," he said. "My father came from Russia with nothing. My family lived the dream of a better life that many of you have lived."

POLICE PRESENCE: Maj.-Gen. Uriel Bar-Lev, currently the senior Israeli police and public security attaché for North America, and a former commander of Israel's southern district and head of police intelligence, was a guest speaker at the recent Canadian Jewish Congress national board of directors meeting. The Ontario Provincial Police chief commissioner, Julian Fantino, was also a special guest. Seen, from left, are national CJC president Mark Freiman, Uriel Bar-Lev, Julian Fantino and Canada Israel Committee chair Moshe Ronen.

Minister examines current state of anti-Semitism

'The most durable and persistent form of hatred'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When it comes to the persistence of anti-Semitism, even in Canada, the largely Jewish audience who came to hear Immigration Minister Jason Kenney recently on the topic did not need to be reminded of each jot and tittle of the phenomenon.

Still, the minister's survey of the current state of anti-Semitism touched a chord among the capacity crowd, as they responded with a standing ovation following his address.

Anti-Semitism, Kenney told a lunchtime audience at the offices of Bennett Jones LLP, is "objectively the most durable and persistent form of hatred and should be of concern to all communities, especially those that face bigotry and hatred."

"When it comes to hatred, anti-Semitism is the canary in the coal mine."

Speaking on "Anti-Semitism Globally and in Canada" at an event presented by the Speakers Action Group and the Canadian Jewish Civil Rights Association, Kenney said there are historical consequences to anti-Semitism and "the uniquely pernicious and durable hatred that is anti-Semitism" should be explored, even to a Jewish audience.

Referring to the 1941 massacre at Babi Yar outside Kiev of 30,000 Jews by Nazi forces, Kenney said the killers mowed down their victims, even toddlers, indiscriminately. In Mumbai last year, terrorist targeted Chabad Lubavitch's Nariman House. The centre is still filled with shrapnel, bullet holes, rubble and "evidence of torture" of Rabbi Gavriel Holtzberg and his wife, Rivkah, Kenney said.

The terrorists specifically selected the nondescript Jewish facility in a city of 30 million, and they displayed the same sort of hatred that was present at Babi Yar. It was, he said, a new manifestation of the old anti-Semitism.

Kenney took direct aim at those who hide their anti-Jewish bias behind the facade of anti-Zionism. While it's true that not all anti-Zionists are anti-Semites, "by and large anti-Zionists are not intellectually honest" when they focus exclusively on Jewish nationalism and ignore other nationalisms. They don't oppose particular Israelis actions, they oppose the existence of the state itself, he said.

Turning to the Canadian scene, Kenney suggested anti-Semitism occurs in universities, where Jewish students are chased down halls for daring to support Israel; at the Toronto International Film Festival, which a number of celebrities protested because of a twinning program with Tel Aviv; and in organizations that seek to remove Hamas and Hezbollah as designated terrorist groups.

Kenney said he once shared the view that "Israel is a bully in the Middle East" serving as a colonial outpost of the United States.

But his worldview changed dramatically after viewing a one-hour presentation by Palestinian Media Watch. It was "an eye-opener" that quoted Palestinian sources – imams, music videos, school texts, news reports – "that were chillingly, explicitly anti-Semitic."

With an election looming, Kenney took some partisan potshots, contrasting how the government of Prime Minister Stephen Harper backed Israel during its 2006 war with Hezbollah – losing nine per cent in the polls as a result – and the statement by current Liberal Michael Ignatieff. Though he didn't mention Ignatieff by name, he clearly was referring to him when he noted he said Israel was guilty of war crimes in Lebanon. (Ignatieff later backed away from that statement.)

Jason Kenney

Those are "profiles in leadership," Kenney stated.

The Canadian government under Harper was the first to pull out of the Durban II, the recent followup to the UN's world anti-racism conference; it joined an international Holocaust remembrance organization; it established an educational centre in Halifax harbour to commemorate the St. Louis, which was not permitted to land Jewish refugees fleeing Germany, and it has provided financial aid to communities to subsidize security measures, he said.

Anti-Semitism can be defeated by practical measures to bring people together, he continued, citing a Jewish/Somali mentorship program.

The antidote to hatred is personal experiences and avoiding social fracturing, he said.

Conflict management prescribed for Mideast

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Efraim Inbar leans forward at the table, looks you straight in the eye and states without hesitation: Israelis don't want peace at the moment, they want to be left alone.

Israelis don't want peace? Did he really say that?

Asked to elaborate on his statement, Inbar, director of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies (BESA) in Ramat Gan, said, "Israelis do not want person-to-person relations [with Palestinians] We want to be left alone."

"Israelis have been sobered by the last 15 years of peace diplomacy," he continued.

Following the failed Camp David peace conference in 2000 and the bloody intifadah that followed, "Israelis became more realistic about what can be achieved. The new consensus in Israel is a readiness for partition and a great skepticism about the Palestinians being able to be partners," he said.

Efraim Inbar

Inbar, a professor of political studies at Bar-Ilan University, was in Toronto last week to meet with supporters of BESA, as well as to inform Hillel students about Mideast developments and deliver a public lecture at a local synagogue.

He went on to New York, where he was scheduled to join with other BESA colleagues to brief the boards of a number of prominent Jewish organizations, including the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations, AIPAC, the Anti-Defamation League, the World Jewish Congress and the American Jewish Congress, as well as give radio and print interviews.

The U.S. visit comes at a propitious moment as President Barack Obama has criticized Israeli settlement policy and appears to be taking a more pro-Arab position, he said.

"I think there's an awakening about Obama's Middle East policy," Inbar said. "I don't know how widespread it is, but I think more are becoming uncomfortable with Obama."

Inbar, who calls himself a conservative, said that the U.S. president is "wrong in putting more of the responsibility for the deadlock on Israel. Israel, under [Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu is ready for partition. The Palestinians received two great offers" – from former Israeli prime ministers Ehud Barak and Ehud Olmert – and turned them both down.

Inbar doesn't believe Obama is a foe of the Jewish state. The U.S. president and his closest advisers want the well-being of Israel, but they're taking the same position as Israel's radical left, which wants the United States "to save Israel despite herself," Inbar said.

"Israel's radical left has lost faith in Israeli democracy. Their views are not popular in Israel. The peace camp is discredited, so instead of fighting their battles in Israel, they try to pressure the democratically elected government through the United States, and they think they're doing Israel a favour."

Inbar pointed to the American Jewish organization J Street, which has ties to the Israeli left, as influencing Obama's views.

Elaborating on his view on "partition," Inbar distinguished it from the "two-state solution" that has envisaged Israel living side by side with a Palestinian state.

That paradigm became popular in the 1990s, "but it doesn't work for two reasons: one, the Palestinian national movement is becoming more extreme. We see their reluctance to accept Israel as a Jewish state and the greater popularity of Hamas in Palestinian society, which is part of a general trend in the Arab and Muslim world towards Islamization," he said.

"Two, given the opportunity to establish a state, they established a failed state. [Former Palestinian Authority president Yasser] Arafat had militias, security organs, but no monopoly over the use of force and it degenerated into chaos. Even in Gaza, there is no monopoly over the use of force."

The Palestinian situation mirrors other such chaotic failed states such as Lebanon, Iraq, Yemen and Somalia. "The Palestinian phenomenon is part of a larger phenomenon of the crisis of Arab political culture," he said.

As to western efforts to help Palestinians "from the bottom up" to create the institutions of a stable government, Inbar stated: "It will fail. You cannot influence societies from outside. You need democratic leaders. In the absence of modernizing leadership in the Palestinian territories, you will have a failed state."

Instead, "we should go for conflict management, lower the loss of life. The whole notion that every problem has a solution is the epitome of western naivete. You live with problems. You try to manage," he said.

Israeli cleantech firms make pitch in Toronto

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Representatives of seven Israeli "cleantech" companies were in Toronto last week to meet with potential "angel" investors eager to earn profits from low-emissions power technology.

The Israeli companies, which are looking for infusions of capital, partnerships or manufacturing contracts in Canada, are centred around the southern Israeli city of Eilat. Noam Ilan, manager of the Renewable Energy Authority of Eilat, which organized the event along with local facilitator Sheldon Potter, said southern Israel is developing a reputation as a clean technology hub.

"Our authority is promoting renewable energy as a catalyst for regional diversity in southern Israel, for the last four years," Ilan said.

Eilat and the surrounding Eilot region are offering a variety of incentives to Israeli companies to develop solar, wind and biomass technologies. These companies are looking for cash infusions and partnerships to develop pilot projects and make their technologies commercially viable, he added.

Potter said Israel is developing a reputation as "the innovation capital of the world. It is a leader."

The Israeli firms that came to Toronto are developing "game-changing technologies," he said.

One of the presenters at last week's breakfast meeting was Aora Solar, which developed power modules that generate 100 kilowatts of electric power in addition to 170 kilowatts of thermal power from a 30-metre tower that stands next to a field of mirrors on 2,000 square metres of land.

Another is Solaris, which generates solar power in installations in water reservoirs.

Two other presenters were companies developing wind and biodiesel technologies.

Some 120 Canadians attended an information breakfast, in which the Israelis pitched their technologies.

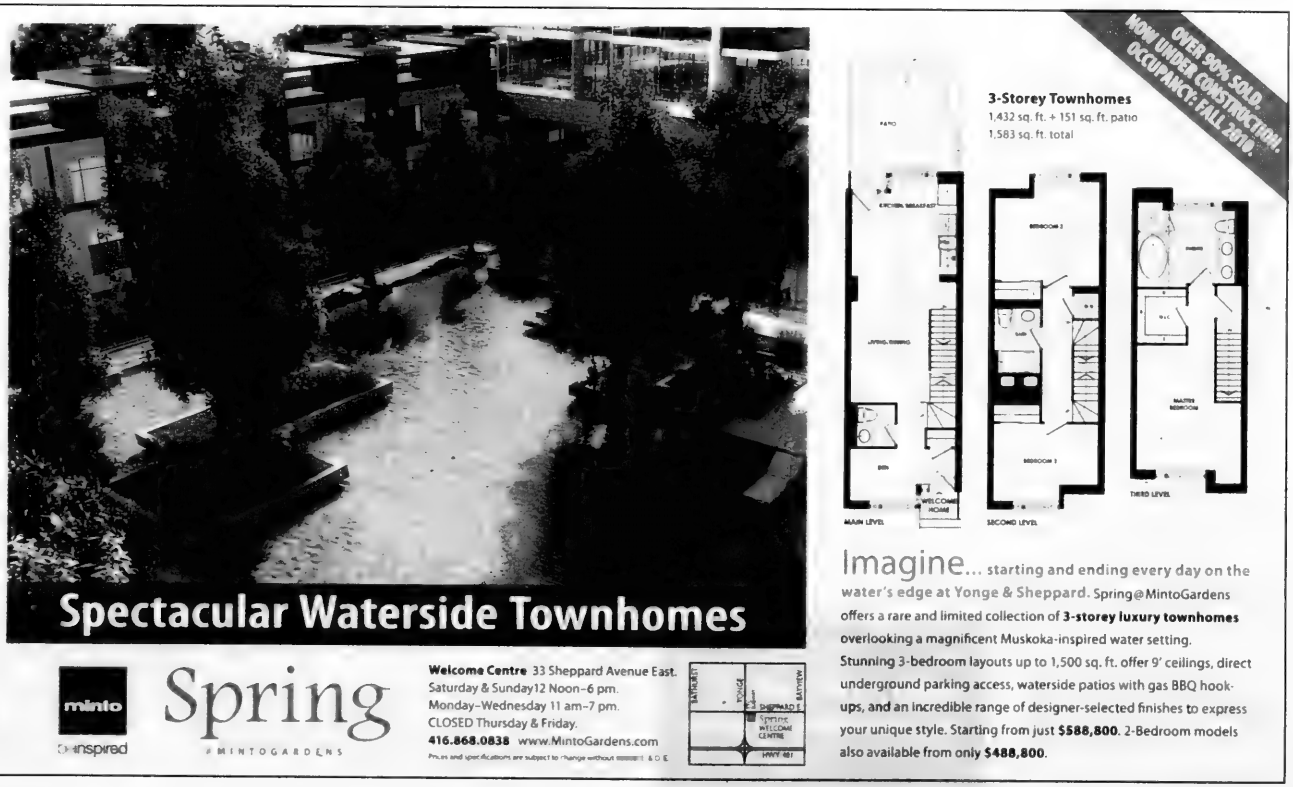
Ilan said Israeli technology firms have traditionally looked for investment capital and partnerships with Americans on the west coast or in the Boston area. "I think Canada is not as familiar."

The Israelis' pursuit of Canadian partners will continue in February, when Eilat hosts a technology show that has in past years attracted more than 1,000 people from around the world. That show has led to some substantial deals, Ilan said, including one in which the German company Siemens invested $15 million (U.S.) in Arava Power.

An Aora pilot project resulted from a meeting with a U.S. investor at the 2007 trade show, he added.

Eilat is home to 60,000 people, while the region of Eilot has 3,000 more. The area's economy has been long based on agriculture and tourism.

Eilat is partnered with Toronto's Jewish community through the Partnership 2000 (P2K) initiative. UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has funded various education programs in Eilat.



Appeal sought in disabilities funding case

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Eight families who are seeking redress from the provincial government for medical services they believe their children should receive while attending parochial school say they'll try to appeal after losing their case in Ontario Divisional Court earlier this month.

The judges ruled 2-1 against the families. They now have a short time to file for a leave to appeal the decision, which they're in the process of doing, said Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools.

Walfish told The CJN last week that even after they file their leave to appeal, it's not expected that the court will return a decision before November at the earliest.

The eight families – seven Jewish and one Muslim – sued the Ontario government for not funding services for children who are blind, deaf or learning disabled and who attend non-Catholic faith-based schools. The lawsuit asserted that the government is violating the children's rights under Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The same services are funded for students in Ontario's public and Catholic schools.

The lawsuit was filed in 2007.

The families – represented by Toronto lawyer Allan Kaufman – argued their case on the basis of both discrimination by religion and by disability.

In their decision against the families, the Divisional Court judges ruled out the families' claim of discrimination of their Charter Right to freedom of religion by citing the 1996 ruling of Adler v. Ontario: "It is the province's plenary power to legislate with regard to public schools, which are open to all members of society, without distinction, that is constitutionally entrenched."

Walfish said the second argument about fair funding for children with special physical needs is the one the families will now rely on to proceed with an appeal.

Kaufman argued that children with certain types of disabilities – even those who attend faith-based, non-Catholic schools – qualify for government funding for seven types of services.

The funded services – speech therapy, occupational therapy, physiotherapy, nursing services, dietetic services, training of school personnel to provide the services, and the provision of medical supplies for therapy – are considered health matters by the government and have been funded by the Ministry of Health since 2000.

However, resources for students who are blind, deaf or have learning disabilities are funded by the Ministry of Education.

The families argued that this bureaucratic split leads to public school children receiving more care than those in faith-based schools.

The dissenting judge agreed with this argument, Walfish said, adding that it's "a very rare thing" for this to happen at this court level, so the chances of reversing the ruling are good if the families are allowed to appeal it.

Speaking to The CJN last May, Kaufman said the Health Ministry sets aside $14.4 million annually to be shared among all students in faith-based schools for health-related disabilities, but it only spends about $4.5 million of that amount.

He believes the remaining $10 million would cover the cost of resources for students in faith-based schools who are deaf, blind or have learning disabilities and can't access funding for necessary services from the Ministry of Education.

Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Eric Lawee, Acting Director

"The air of the Land of Israel makes one wise," asserts the Talmud – a statement that seemed especially apt when thousands of scholars assembled this past summer for the Fifteenth World Congress of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem. Seven Centre members delivered papers, making York the best represented university outside of Israel at this five-day international academic gathering. Adding further lustre to the Centre's participation in the Congress was a privilege bestowed upon our director, Sara Horowitz. In her capacity as the president of the Association for Jewish Studies, the main North American learned society of Jewish Studies, she was asked to speak at the opening ceremony, further highlighting the Centre's leading position in the field.

Beyond contributing to cutting-edge Judaic learning, I'm sure many felt as I did that participation in the Congress communicated some important additional messages. For one thing, the Congress, which is held at the Mount Scopus campus of The Hebrew University in Jerusalem, commenced almost seven years to the day after a terrorist bombing at a Mount Scopus campus cafeteria claimed seven lives and injured scores more. For another, we gathered as a crusade by a vocal minority continues to seek a boycott against Israeli academic institutions. Seen in these contexts, participation in the Congress amounted to a strong statement of solidarity with victims of terrorism and a clear affirmation of resolve to support the robust and amazingly accomplished world of Israeli academe.

Speaking of ties to Israeli scholars, this past year saw the inauguration of the York University Visiting Professorship in Israel Studies, which brings a visiting professor to our campus from Israel to teach, do research, and give public lectures. Professor Arye Naor of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev inaugurated the program in the winter term and we are delighted to have Professor Orit Rozin of Tel Aviv University with us for the full year this year. The visiting professorship reflects the fertile collaboration between "town" and "gown" that York prizes, as it has been made possible by generous private donors, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and York's Faculty of Liberal Arts and Professional Studies.

Jewish studies courses stretch back almost to York's inception but our Jewish studies program, which allows students to major or minor in the field, is fairly new. It promises to reach new heights under the leadership of its new coordinator, Professor Kalman Weiser.

Also new, in a way, is the coordinator of our Program in Jewish Teacher Education, Professor Laura Wiseman. Actually, Professor Wiseman has been a mainstay of the program, which trains students to teach in a wide range of Jewish days schools, for many years. She now brings her dedication to it, and her expertise in Hebrew language and poetry, to York full time.

The Centre is on the move physically as well as intellectually, with our home now situated in the new York Research Tower. Here we join other research centres in a space designed to promote synergies between scholars with diverse interests and enhance collaboration among Jewish studies faculty, graduate students, and visiting scholars.

While the New Year spurs thoughts of new developments, many things at the Centre remain the same. Centre members continue to win plaudits for excellent research and fine teaching while serving in leading roles in professional Jewish Studies organizations in Canada and abroad.

Also continuing is our reliance on our many friends in the community who enable the Centre to achieve its goals. Special mention should be made of members of the Centre Advisory Committee and of its energetic chair, Barbara Bank, to whom we owe a special debt of gratitude.

I invite you to join us for lectures and cultural events at York and to assist us as we seek to grow, pursuing ever more ambitious challenges and aims.

On behalf of my colleagues at the Centre, I also wish you the best of the blessings in the new year.

Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education

The theme for this year's annual Leonard Wolinsky Lecture Series was "From Sand Dunes to Skyscrapers: Tel Aviv at 100," celebrating the 100th anniversary of the city of Tel Aviv. The event featured Professor Barbara Mann, speaking on "Tel Aviv, Holy City," and Professor Maoz Azaryahu, speaking on "Tel Aviv Remembers." Professor Mann is an associate professor of Jewish Literature and the Simon H. Fabian Chair in Hebrew Literature, at the Jewish Theological Seminary. Professor Azaryahu is an associate professor for Cultural Geography at the University of Haifa, Israel.

Left to right: Mira Adler, a director of the Leonard Wolinsky Foundation and daughter of the late Leonard Wolinsky, and Professor Maoz Azaryahu, University of Haifa.

BA in Jewish Studies

The Jewish Studies major at York University has not only provided me with a comprehensive understanding of Jewish "basics", but it has also enhanced my knowledge of Jewish life throughout the ages in a multifaceted way: sociologically, linguistically, culturally, textually, and religiously. I strongly recommend the program to students who are looking to cultivate and enrich their understanding of Judaism through vigorous, passionate, and critical study.

Sarah Turk, Jewish Studies Major

Centre members stand in the forefront of the discovery and communication of new knowledge

Two recent milestone works by Centre scholars are: From an Antique Land, edited by Professor Carl Ehrlich, which lifts the veil on Near Eastern literature from Biblical times, and an annotated Hebrew edition of the Torah commentary of Samuel ben Meir (Rashbam), by Professor Martin Lockshin, which not only provides the pointed Hebrew text of the commentary but also explains in detail the ideas of one of pre-modern Judaism's most free-thinking Bible commentators.

Professor Naor with Barbara Bank, chair of the Centre's Advisory Committee

Visiting Professorship in Israel Studies

On March 15, 2009, Professor Arye Naor, professor of public policy and administration at Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, delivered the inaugural lecture for the York University Visiting Professorship in Israel Studies, entitled, "The People Have Spoken: The Election Results in Israel." York's ongoing project has been made possible by a partnership with Henry and Julia Koschitzky, the Jack Weinbaum Family Foundation, the Allen and Milli Gould Family Foundation, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and support from York's Faculty of Liberal Arts and Professional Studies.

The Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut & Elizabeth S. Plaut Library's new home

At a special reception held in November 2008, the Centre marked the acquisition of the Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut Intellectual Property Collection, including the copyright to Rabbi Plaut's published works, while York's Libraries marked the addition to the Clara Thomas Archives & Special Collections of the Rabbi W. Gunther Plaut & Elizabeth S. Plaut Library, consisting of more than 4,000 books. The Canadian Cultural Property Export Review Board certified the Plaut Library as cultural property of outstanding significance and national importance.

Speaking at the reception, the Centre's current acting director, Professor Eric Lawee, described the collection as "one-of-a-kind" while indicating how the copyright royalties will support significant academic conferences and publications for years to come.

80 USY grads leave for year in Israel

Compiled by CJN staff

Eighty recent graduates of United Synagogue Youth (USY) departed at the beginning of September for Israel, and among them were four women from Toronto.

The four Torontonians are Miri Elmaleh, Laura Elman, Anna Gol and Ayelet Seed.

As part of USY's Nativ college/leadership program, they'll spend the next nine months studying, touring, volunteering and learning new leadership techniques. USY is the high school affiliate of the United Synagogue of Conservative Judaism.

It's one of the largest Nativ groups in the program's 29-year history, said USY director Jules Gutin.

This year's Nativ students come from 22 different American states and three Canadian provinces. From September through mid-January, students have the option of pursuing academic studies at Hebrew University's Rothberg School for Overseas Studies, studying Jewish texts at the United Synagogue's Conservative Yeshiva in Jerusalem or taking an intensive ulpan.

After winter break, students can choose to live and volunteer on a kibbutz, or they can volunteer in an Israeli development town.

The leadership training aspects of the program have enabled many Nativ graduates to assume leadership positions in the North American Jewish community. Several have become rabbis, while others have gone on to careers in Jewish youth work and risen to lay leadership positions in their synagogues and regions, or have made aliyah.

For more information, visit www.nativ.org, or contact Nahum Binder, USY's central shaliach, at 212-533-7800, ext. 1118, or at nativ@uscj.org.

About Yad Vashem

Yad Vashem, The Holocaust Remembrance and Education Centre in Jerusalem, is the universal guardian and imparter of the Shoah's (Holocaust's) legacy and the protector of human values. Visited by over one million people annually, Yad Vashem is internationally recognized as being at the forefront of Holocaust commemoration, education, documentation and research.

About The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem is one of Yad Vashem's largest and most prominent of its twenty eight representative bodies worldwide. The Society supports Yad Vashem's initiatives and implements its important vision across Canada.

Through its educational and commemorative activities, the Society carries out Yad Vashem's mission of ensuring that the Holocaust and its lessons are forever engraved in the memory of humankind.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Holocaust Wall of Remembrance

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Holocaust Wall of Remembrance at Earl Bales Park was built by the Founders of the Society in order to immortalize the six million souls murdered by the Nazis and their collaborators.

The Canadian Society for Yad Vashem Holocaust Wall of Remembrance is etched with the names of these precious souls who were murdered in the Shoah as well as of those Canadian citizens who survived the Shoah and have since passed away.

The theme for 2009 is "Children in the Holocaust," recalling the 1.5 million children who were prevented from growing up and fulfilling their basic rights: to live, dream, love, play and laugh. As part of the 2009 Memorial Service, children from our own community will participate in various activities. Through these efforts, we will permanently remember each name, as Isaiah (56:5) proclaimed, "I will give them a monument and a name....that shall never be cut off."

Remembering the past, Shaping the future

Voight lashes out at critics of Tel Aviv's inclusion

Voight wrote that "people like Jane Fonda and all the names on that letter are assisting the Palestinian propagandists against the State of Israel.

"Does she not remember what actually took place in Gaza? Did Israel not give the Palestinians of Gaza the hope that there could be peace? In response, did Hamas not launch rockets from Gaza into Israel, killing many innocent people?" Voight added.

"I was in Israel. I saw the rockets coming down on Sderot and visited many families who lost their loved ones. How long can a democratic country keep from defending itself?"

In statements compiled by UJA Federation, other filmmakers and actors also spoke out against the protesters.

"I am against censorship in all its forms," said Eastern Promises director David Cronenberg. "The attempts to stop TIFF's City to City spotlight on Tel Aviv amount to political censorship. I am against it."

Driver, an English actor, said that "empowered groups of people, deciding whose stories can, and cannot be told, does nothing but remind us of oppression that has no place in filmmaking."

Fiddler on the Roof director Jewison said the attack on the Tel Aviv program, which runs until Sept. 19, is an attempt to politicize art.

"It has been demonstrated that in Israel, artists are free to create work, which often is critical of their own society. Waltz with Bashir was nominated for an Academy Award last year, despite its criticism of Israeli government policy. This recent attempt at political censorship smacks of anti-Semitic bigotry. Let's keep political hatred out of the artistic community," he said.

Ghostbusters director Reitman added that film is about telling stories and exploring complexities of the human condition.

"Any attempt to silence that conversation – to hijack the festival for any political agenda – in the end, only serves to silence artistic voices."

Filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici used stronger words when he wrote that "from their twisted perspective, everything that Israel does is, by definition, illegitimate and everything that the enemies of Israel do is, by definition, legitimate. This is anti-Semitism in its crudest form."

Igal Hecht, a Toronto filmmaker, wrote a letter in support of TIFF organizers who defended their choice to showcase Israeli film and created a Facebook group called "Supporting Israeli films at TIFF 2009," which had about 350 members at The CJN's deadline.

In a Sept. 11 op-ed in the National Post titled "Naomi Klein's TIFF protest is an attack on our freedom," Lantos said that "the difference between most people and professional liars is that the latter have no shame…

"Lying without shame and without reservations is at the heart of their strategy. They bank on decent people's assumption that when a statement of 'fact' is made repeatedly and with emphasis, it must contain a modicum of truth."

He said the title of the letter, "No Celebration of Occupation," implies that Tel Aviv is occupied territory.

"That is more than just a lie. That is a regurgitation of terrorist slogans. We are not talking about the West Bank or the Golan Heights here. We are talking about the biggest population centre in the heart of Israel, where the first neighbourhood was built in 1887."

StandWithUs, an Israeli advocacy group, released a statement in support of the festival spotlight and in opposition of claim in the "Toronto Declaration" that Tel Aviv was built on "destroyed Palestinian villages."

"Tel Aviv was built on empty sand dunes outside of Jaffa in 1909, and its population swelled in part because repeated Arab violence against Jaffa's Jews in 1920, 1921, 1929, and 1936-1939 forced thousands to relocate to Tel Aviv," the statement said.

Rabbi Marvin Hier, founder of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Los Angeles, who was in Toronto last week to announce the Dec. 7 Toronto premiere of a film about Winston Churchill titled Walking With Destiny, also spoke out against the signatories, accusing them of distorting history.

"The Toronto protesters would have us believe that Gaza was the opening act, rather than the murderous and irresponsible behaviour demonstrated by Hamas after receiving control of Gaza from Israel. Israel did not want to retaliate on Gaza, but was forced to defend its citizens," he said, referring to the claim that showcasing Israeli film in the wake of Gaza war is in poor taste.

"It is the height of hypocrisy to single out Tel Aviv. These protesters cannot masquerade their hatred toward Israel, which so distorts their view," the rabbi added.

In an interview with the Toronto Star, Klein said more than 1,000 people have signed the letter, and an event to publicize the final list was scheduled for Sept. 14. The CJN reported last week that the signatories had planned to hold a press conference on Sept. 10, but the plans were cancelled.

Volunteer program combines learning, social action

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Bev Devins, co-ordinator of special programs at Baycrest, is particularly passionate about one that is now entering its fourth year.

Set to begin again on Oct. 18, the program is run by BayviewCorridorOrg., a group of Bayview Avenue synagogues that have banded together to take part in social action projects.

About 20 members of Beit Rayim Synagogue, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Temple Emanu-El, Temple Har Zion and Shaar Shalom Synagogue meet one Sunday morning a month for a theme-based discussion on topics such as Jewish texts or films, a visit with residents, and a period of reflection after the visit.

Devins said that the program is modelled after the U.S.-based Spark Heart Action program, whose mission is to inspire an ongoing commitment to community service as part of each person's life and as an important expression of Jewish identity.

Ken Stewart, a BayviewCorridor member who belongs to Beth Tikvah, said the group decided to volunteer at Baycrest after Devins attended a meeting and told them that the centre urgently needed volunteer visitors.

"We did some research, and came up with the Spark program, which was pioneered by the Reform movement in the United States. It was originally intended as a program for adolescents to visit seniors," he said, "so we modified it to apply to a group of adults visiting seniors in a long-term care facility."

Devins said that people are always surprised when they hear that Baycrest is looking for volunteers. "They just aren't aware of how many residents need visitors. Most residents have suffered many losses, and they're looking for a connection," she said. "They thrive when they have regular visits."

The program meets the needs of both the visitors and the residents, she added. "The volunteers benefit from meeting with the seniors, and they benefit from meeting with other volunteers. It is an enriched volunteer experience."

The volunteers are "totally" committed to the project, and are anxious to begin year four, Devins said. "The residents and the volunteers – many visit throughout the month – have developed a special bond.

"I learned how important these visits are to the residents when one said to me, 'I need food and I need visitors.'"

A bonus, she said, is to have a volunteer that speaks another language. "Baycrest is rich with languages. If we can get a volunteer who speaks a resident's language, it adds [another dimension] to the visit."

She said that the program – they request a nine-month commitment – is not restricted to BayviewCorridor members. "We always need volunteer visitors, and we welcome them to take part."

We continue to build upon a proud tradition of Jewish scholarship at the University of Toronto. Our commitment is to educating students from all backgrounds about the various ways in which Jewish Thought, History, and Culture have participated in the world and its civilization.

Over the past year, we have increased our course offerings, created new programs, and expanded our interdisciplinary reach. With over fifty faculty members and connections to twenty departments and programs at the University of Toronto, we provide undergraduate and graduate students with a diverse and rewarding academic experience.

We offer an interdisciplinary undergraduate program that balances flexibility with rigour. While benefiting from course offerings across the Faculty of Arts and Sciences, our undergraduates concentrate in one of four areas. 1. Jewish Thought; 2. Classical Judaism; 3. Jewish Culture, Languages and Literatures; and 4. Jewish History and Social Sciences.

Our collaborative master's and doctoral programs take advantage of the full range of outstanding Jewish Studies scholars and mentors at the University of Toronto. Our graduate students are trained in Jewish Studies broadly while they research specific topics in a core discipline of the humanities or social sciences.

THANK YOU FOR YOUR CONTINUED GENEROSITY

We can provide our students and faculty with the best academic environment for their education and research because of your donations. It is therefore with much gratitude that we acknowledge the members of our community who sponsor us. Your support today secures a program of excellence for tomorrow.

For this new year, we wish you and your family much happiness, health, and success. May it be a year of peace and prosperity.

Cancer survivor runs to raise awareness

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Marathon runner Issie Pelc says that he runs because he can.

The 59-year-old father of three who started running about 10 years ago, is a cancer survivor, "and I run in spite of my medical history. It reaffirms my life."

Pelc was diagnosed with lymphoma in 2006, one week before he ran in the Boston Marathon. "I was determined to keep going, and I kept running during the four months of chemotherapy and one month of radiation at Princess Margaret Hospital."

He gradually built back up to a full running routine, and by the end of that year, he ran another marathon.

"When I crossed the finish line, I knew I was back in the game," said Pelc, who recently sold his wholesale food business.

He ran in Boston again in 2007 and has run a marathon each month since. "My quest is to run 60 marathons by the time I turn 60 in June.

"I've finished 29 monthly marathons, and I've run 50 altogether. I'm running in the Toronto Waterfront marathon on Sept. 27, so I should reach my goal."

His family is supportive, he said. "My daughter writes me good-luck notes before each marathon."

But he's not just running to prove that he can.

"My wife, Shelley, is having her own battle with ovarian cancer, and she is emotional about her own plight," Pelc said. "I'm running to raise awareness of the need to fund more cancer care and research."

'When I crossed the finish line, I knew I was back in the game'

As a patient at Princess Margaret Hospital, Shelley is currently participating in a clinical trial that has shown a lot of promise. "Her tumours have been under control since last year. I'm running to let it be known that cancer can indeed be beaten. Look at me. I had cancer and came out running marathons.

"I also want to publicize that past research is saving lives, and more research will save more lives in the future."

Running has been his way of life for the past 10 years, he said. "Along with cycling, it keeps me fit. I love it. I can't even describe how it makes me feel. I'm also hoping it will motivate people to donate to my cause.

"It's a win-win situation. It makes me feel great, and I'm running for a good cause. Unfortunately, there is a lot of illness out there. I'm doing what I can."

An audible breakthrough for the hearing impaired

ISRAEL21c

A new Israeli technology is making waves for those who use hearing devices.

Called Clearcall, the software has the ability to improve the quality of voices heard through hearing aids and cochlear implants.

Functioning as miniature amplifiers in or outside the ear, hearing aids and cochlear implants not only increase the volume of voices, but they ramp up background noise as well. This makes it difficult for the hard of hearing to make sense of what's being said when they are in a busy work environment or a café, says Prof. Miriam Furst-Yust of Tel Aviv University, who developed Clearcall.

In these situations, "hearing-impaired people have a real problem understanding speech," she explains.

"Their devices may be useful in a quiet room, but once the background noise levels ramp up, the devices become less useful. Our algorithm helps filter out irrelevant noise so they can better understand the voices of their friends and family."

The new patented invention is easy to install on existing implants and hearing aids, requiring companies to insert it into their operating software. The university's tech transfer company Ramot is currently in talks with several manufacturers.

"We've developed a mathematical model of the ear that shows how speech recognition works," says Furst-Yust.

"The math is complicated, but basically we're cleaning auditory information before it goes to the brain. We get rid of some of the information – the background noise – so that the hearing-impaired have an easier time "filling in" missing information that their ears can't give them," she says.

First developed for cellphones to make it easier to hear voices on the receiver's end, it was found that Clearcall distorted the human voice too much, making it uncomfortable for most people to use. That's when Furst-Yust started applying her tools to hearing aids.

For people who are born deaf or are used to listening through aids, understanding the way Clearcall distorts the human voice is something they can more readily accept.

"It takes some getting used to," she says, "but people who have been wearing hearing aids all their lives have no problem getting the most from Clearcall. And we can train the newly hearing-impaired in a quick introductory session."

Using the brain's own sound recognition centres, Clearcall helps the wearer separate voices from background noise. With continued use and a short training period, the Clearcall software can improve the clarity of voices from 30 to 50 per cent, says Furst-Yust. She is currently putting her results into a scientific paper.

Meanwhile, she continues to refine her algorithm for future applications. Furst-Yust imagines that this base technology will one day have a number of functions beyond servicing the hearing impaired, including a noise-cancelling device to drown out iPod music coming from other people's headphones.

Former shul transformed into special-needs centre

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A major construction project well underway in the Côte des Neiges district will benefit children with special needs, and preserve a former synagogue whose architecture has heritage significance.

The first phase of the Friendship Centre and LifeTown, an $8-million project, is being built in the old Congregation Chevra Shaas on Bourret Avenue at Lajoie Street.

The synagogue, which closed its doors because of a dwindling membership, was bought three years ago by an anonymous donor for the Friendship Circle, an international non-profit organization with roots in the Lubavitch community.

Since they founded the Friendship Circle's Montreal chapter in 2001, it has been the dream of Rabbi Yosef Paris and his wife Sima to provide it with its own place, one large enough to meet the demand from families for activities for their children and a little respite for themselves.

The chapter runs recreational and social activities for children who are intellectually and physically challenged and support services for their families. Its volunteer program, which encourages teens to be "friends" to the children, has been especially successful.

But the program has had to operate largely out of various rented spaces, which has limited how much can be done, Sima said.

Ground was broken for the first phase of the project, the Friendship Centre, in May 2008 and the official opening and ribbon-cutting is expected to take place in February.

The Friendship Centre, which will occupy 26,000 square feet on two levels, will offer greatly expanded therapeutic and recreational services.

The second phase, LifeTown, the centerpiece of the ambitious project, will involve the construction of an addition to the building where the parking lot is now.

LifeTown, a registered trademark, will be modelled on the Friendship Circle's flagship facility in West Bloomfield, Michigan, where children with special needs can learn daily living skills. As envisioned, this indoor mock city will have a drugstore, grocery, pet shop, movie theatre, bank, doctor's office and library, where the children can prepare for real life. LifeTown even has working traffic lights.

Sima calls it the first of its kind in Canada.

She is projecting that the centre, when in full operation, will reach 3,000 children and their families annually.

New group lets students create own programs

By ROBERT WALKER
Special to The CJN

"Eighteen- to twenty-six-year-olds are the most idealistic people around," says Max Kalles, who launched GROW Toronto, an organization that gives Jewish students and young professionals the opportunity to connect to their idealistic goals.

"But they feel paralyzed by their big dreams," adds Kalles, 28, a Thornhill resident and IT entrepreneur.

Kalles hopes that GROW, launched last fall, will motivate students to achieve their dreams.

GROW, which stands for "Giving, Responsibility, Opportunity, Wisdom," gives participants the chance to organize a program of their choice.

Past events – all of which were organized by students – included packing food boxes for Shabbat for low-income families, a Purim carnival for children with developmental disabilities, playing music for the elderly, a musical evening to benefit a cancer charity and two Jewish improv comedy nights, called Made Jew Laugh.

Currently based only in Toronto, GROW is hoping to expand into other cities this year by finding interested volunteers looking to start a branch in their area.

With more than 400 people registered as members of the organization's Facebook group, students are responding to this approach.

GROW is now in the process of being registered as a non-profit so that it will be able to collect donations and expand its programs.

Kalles says that until then, volunteers will have to continue creating programming without any funding.

"We've done everything with zero dollars," he says.

"By learning to be a giver, you can't be apathetic," Kalles says, adding that the student-run events also give participants an opportunity to grow as leaders and build skills.

"We're not a chesed [kindness] organization. We use chesed to improve the individual."

GROW participants lend a helping hand in one of GROW's first programs last fall – making packages of food for Shabbat for needy families.

It's a point echoed by Tali Dayan, 25, GROW's director of development. She says they offer a unique two-fold opportunity for people to get involved.

"Our members change the world, but they also fundamentally change themselves," Dayan says.

"We better the world and bring out the leaders in all of us."

She says GROW gives all students the opportunity to take a turn running a program or event.

"It is because of this that we see our organization as the Wikipedia of charities – it is member-generated."

Kalles says that's what makes GROW unique, and what spurs change. He says the main reason people's idealism often doesn't translate into action is because of intimidation, and the feeling that a person is too small or inexperienced to effect any change.

"If everyone wants to do philanthropy, why aren't we doing it? Students should be able to do philanthropy now," he says.

For Mark Rootenberg, 21, a York University psychology student, that's what has kept him involved in GROW.

He was first introduced to it by a volunteer, and was asked to host Made Jew Laugh, an improv comedy night last November, with funds going to Ronald McDonald House.

"I thought it was awesome. The place was packed to almost beyond capacity, and it was so much fun."

Rootenberg also hosted GROW's second Made Jew Laugh earlier this summer, and he says his favourite part of the organization is the guaranteed support for every project.

"If there's a certain cause you want to do something for, GROW allows you to do something, instead of letting that feeling go to waste," he says.

"And once you get involved in it, it creates a community of people to get together who help out on each other's causes."

That's something Kalles likes to hear.

"When they organize events, they start to realize they're not so powerless."

About People

The Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC) recently changed the composition of its national board. Taking over from Dennis Bennie as new national chair is Joel Reitman, CEO of Toronto-based, tech company Mijo Corporation. Mark Waldman assumes the role of deputy chair.

"One of our most important goals is to increase CJPAC's presence throughout Canada and to get Jewish communities across the country more actively involved in the political process. We have much work ahead of us! I encourage community members to join and contribute to CJPAC, get involved and help make an impact beyond our numbers," Reitman said in a statement last month.

The committee is currently conducting a search for a new executive director, after Josh Cooper left to become JNF Toronto's executive director in August.

Obituary

Sephardi matriarch 'was way ahead of her time'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Anita Bengio, a matriarch of Toronto's Moroccan Jewish community who passed away late last month, will be remembered as a tzadikah and a "true eshet chayil," a woman of valour.

Alex Bengio, the younger of her two sons, spoke to The CJN in the days following the passing of his mother, who died at the age of 88 – he thinks.

"That's the thing about her – she never really divulged her real age. Officially, I think she was 88," he said.

"Her personality was such that you would ask her how old she is and she would say, 'What do you think?' And whatever you would say, she'd say, 'You got it,' because they usually guessed lower."

He spoke about his mother, who moved to Toronto in 1961 after the first Moroccan Jews began to move to Toronto in the late 1950s, as a woman who could do it all with ease and grace.

"She was quite a woman, way ahead of her time. She not only looked after our family in terms of doing a more traditional wife's role in terms of cooking and baking and all that, but she had a full time job working for the Zionist Organization of Canada," he said, adding that she worked as the secretary to the executive director of the organization for 20 years, until 1981.

"At the same time, she would do stuff for the shul."

As the first president of the sisterhood of the Petah Tikva Anshe Castilla Congregation – a position she held from 1962 to 1966 – she helped raise funds for the Sephardi shul.

In 1969, she started another sisterhood at Tiferet Israel Congregation, another Sephardi shul, where her husband, the late Rabbi Jack Bengio, served as its spiritual leader.

"Being president of the sisterhood, there were a lot of meetings for that. And to top it off, she would bake late at night. She would do all this, and you would see her the next day and she would look like she had gotten a full night's sleep and was just like everybody else," her son recalled.

His mother, who was famous for her baking, said that it wasn't until her boss' wife encouraged her to open her own bakery that she decided to pursue the idea.

He said it was hard for her to imagine taking a risk like starting a new business, because she was so responsible and wanted the security of having a steady paycheque to provide for her family, but she eventually took the risk and thrived as the owner of the Anita Bengio Patisserie in Toronto for more than 25 years.

"She was very responsible and into details and whenever she did something, she did it so well… When she ran her own business, she basically did it herself," her son said.

"She must have made a lot of cakes for a lot of people, because right now, I'm getting cards at home from people I've never heard of."

At the Aug. 30 funeral at Steeles Memorial Chapel, Ruben Bengio, Anita's oldest son, told the mourners that his mother was a "a true eshet chayil, an exemplary daughter, a devoted wife, an outstanding mother, a warm and caring sister, aunt and great-aunt, and an unbelievable grandmother."

But, he said, what was equally important was her devotion to the community.

"Her ambition was to take a sapling, nurture it and watch it grow so that the community, her children and grandchildren could one day bear the fruits of her labour. Her activities, as founding president of the Petah Tikva sisterhood, raised enough money then to be able to supply the synagogue with much-needed holy and mundane supplies so that it could grow."

Anita Bengio

During his eulogy, he also read from letters his own children wrote about their late grandmother.

Jack Bengio, the eldest, who wasn't able to attend the memorial because he was in Israel, said that his grandmother – known by all her grandchildren as "Mamana" because of his inability to pronounce Mama Anita as a child – was known for her warmth and selflessness.

"A heart, ravaged by years of heart failure, which had undergone various procedures, is the very heart that was so caring, so giving and so loving to all who knew her. For years, even though I grew up far away in Dallas, I would cherish my grandmother's visits to our house, as well as my time to visit her in Toronto. She was always smiling, always laughing, always gentle, and especially, always giving of herself," her grandson wrote.

"She would never say one thing and mean another. She was always very honest, and her reputation always preceded her."

Caryn Bengio, a granddaughter who wrote a note from New York, where she is studying, also spoke about what she'll miss most about her grandmother.

"I'll miss your signature Mamana smell and holding your soft hands, hearing your necklaces and bracelets jingle, hearing your laugh, seeing your smile. I'll miss writing you e-mails and chatting with you on Facebook so much. I'll miss your sense of humour and our inside jokes."

Alex Bengio, her younger son, said that as a matriarch of Toronto's Moroccan Jewish community, which is very tight-knit and emphasizes the importance of family, community and tradition, his mother led by example.

"She was my role model… You watched her and you would just pick up all her traits," he said.

"Two things she would say is that you always guard your name, make sure you make a good name for yourself and do good deeds, because that is basically all you have left when you leave this world."

He said that last week when he went into his mother's bedroom, he came across a note that was sitting on her night table.

"It said, 'I only pass through this earth once and any good that I can do to any human being, let me not defer it and do it now'… That's what she lived by. It wasn't just something that she said."

He said he hopes people remember his mother for her integrity, her strength, and her positive outlook on life.

"If I had a problem, or someone had a problem, you tend to complain about things… But she was always smiling. She was always lifting you up. She always had a way of making you feel better and bringing you up from wherever you were," he said.

"To a lot of people she was a baker, and she was this and that, but to me, she was my mom and a very good one at that."

Rabbi Orenstein takes helm at historic shul

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Schachar Orenstein

MONTREAL — The spiritual leadership of Canada's oldest Jewish congregation has passed into the hands of a guitar-playing, bicycle-riding 30-something rabbi.

Rabbi Schachar Orenstein, 36, is the new rabbi of the Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue, succeeding Rabbi Howard Joseph, who has retired after nearly 40 years.

Rabbi Orenstein had been associate rabbi for almost 2-1/2 years, gradually taking over duties from Rabbi Joseph, who continues to play a role as rabbi emeritus. Since returning to Montreal from Vancouver, Rabbi Orenstein has already helped revitalize the synagogue through young adult programming, some of it unconventional, like whitewater rafting and parties where he may pick up his guitar and sing.

He is a committed environmentalist, usually cycles to the synagogue and is a vegetarian. Since his arrival, he has guided the synagogue into greater recycling, energy conservation and waste reduction, and is encouraging his fellow pulpit rabbis to do the same.

"I try to practise what I preach," he says.

He is the founder of Teva Quebec, a Jewish group concerned with ecology, and for the second year in a row, is leading a cleanup of the Lachine shoreline this month as part of a Canada-wide volunteer project sponsored by TD Bank.

Rabbi Orenstein brings to the Spanish and Portuguese, officially established in 1768, some of the innovative thinking of the small Vancouver synagogue he led for two years, Shaarey Tefilah Synagogue.

Born in Ramat Gan to Israeli parents, Rabbi Orenstein grew up in Winnipeg and attended Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the Jewish day school now called Gray Academy.

He thought he would go into medicine and came to Montreal to study at McGill University. Throughout his undergraduate and graduate years, he combined his science major with Jewish studies. He also started attending two local yeshivot, Mercaz Hatalmud and Noam Hatorah.

He was eventually ordained by his two mentors, Rabbi Leib Baron, now living in Jerusalem, and the late Rabbi Joshua Shmidman, as well as two rabbis from Memphis, Tenn.

"I was conflicted for some time over whether to continue in medicine, and I came close to becoming a doctor, but my love of Jewish studies won out," he said. An offer to become assistant rabbi at Congregation Shaar Hashomayim, Montreal's largest and most prestigious congregation, helped make up his mind.

He worked from 2001 to 2004 with Rabbi Barry Gelman before being "lured," as he puts it, to the West Coast shul, which had about 200 members and a more intimate and informal atmosphere than the Shaar. This younger community was environmentally aware, and Rabbi Orenstein joined the Jewish environmental group Adam va-Adamah (Hebrew for man and earth).

"I did everything there: I was Torah reader, cantor, even the cook, making the cholent. The congregation sang a lot and I played the guitar [although not on Shabbat]. It was wonderful training and furthered my development," he said.

Then came a call from Rabbi Joseph, who was winding down his career, inviting him to apply to become associate rabbi during a transition period before he retired. A native New Yorker, Rabbi Joseph arrived at the Spanish and Portuguese in January 1970, and is credited with building up its membership from a low of under 300 families.

It was another offer Rabbi Orenstein could not refuse.

The Spanish and Portuguese, which has been at its present Snowdon site since 1947, has a culturally diverse membership of about 800, of whom up to 80 per cent are Sephardi.

"It's a real mosaic," he said. "There are five services at the High Holidays: Iraqi, Moroccan, Lebanese, Spanish/Portuguese and Ashkenazi, all with different melodies and flavours." The Ashkenazi presence was boosted a couple of years ago when nearby Congregation Chevra Shaas closed its doors and joined the Spanish and Portuguese, bringing its rabbi, Emanuel White, with it. Although Rabbi Orenstein is Ashkenazi, he has Sephardi ancestors who were expelled from Spain in 1492 and fled to Amsterdam, he notes.

Since arriving, Rabbi Orenstein has focused on attracting young adults to the synagogue. "We've had a huge success. We've really tapped into the young adult scene, it's surprising. Facebook has been a helpful tool in reaching out," he said. The synagogue is now looking to hire a youth director.

Events have attracted up to 150 people and some are becoming congregational members, he added.

Although independent of the synagogue, Teva Quebec has also been a good conduit to young people who like learning that Judaism has much to say about protecting the environment. Its popularity has grown rapidly and now has a staff thanks to a Gen J grant from Federation CJA, relieving Rabbi Orenstein from some of the work. One of its new projects is providing informal education at four Jewish high schools.

Rabbi Orenstein is now trying to make the synagogue a friendly place for young families and their children. He and his wife Meira Alper, who is from Delaware, have a daughter, Chana, 4, and a son, Noam, 1.

'True peace not possible,' Israeli prof says

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa correspondent

OTTAWA — In order to understand the quest for peace between Israel and its Arab neighbours, one must understand what each side really means by "peace."

So says Prof. Eliezer Tauber, who was in Ottawa last week to speak at the Department of Foreign Affairs as part of a celebration of 60 years of friendly relations between Canada and Israel.

The event, titled "Canada-Israel Relations: a comparison and assessment of 60 Years" was co-hosted by Canada's Department of Foreign Affairs and the Israeli Embassy.

The government was represented by John Baird, minister of transport, infrastructure and communities, speaking on behalf of International Trade Minister Stockwell Day, who had to cancel his scheduled appearance. Baird gave a keynote address to attendees.

Federal minister John Baird gave keynote address

Tauber, dean of the faculty of Jewish Studies at Bar-Ilan University, is an expert on the history of the Middle East, as well as Islam and the Arab-Israeli conflict.

During a pre-conference interview with The CJN, Tauber said that "some of the information that I will give you is based on the fact that I, as a religious Jew, feel I can understand religious Muslims better than a secular person can... and most experts on the Mideast are secular people."

Tauber said the concept of a secular Muslim does not really exist because, according to Islam, a Muslim who becomes secular must be killed. Therefore, the vast majority of Muslims do, in fact, follow their religion.

The success or failure of today's peace negotiations hinges on the ancient Treaty of Hudaybiyya, which the prophet Muhammad signed in exchange for permission to enter the city of Mecca to perform the Hajj. Two years after signing the treaty, Muhammad was powerful enough to annul it, enter Mecca and "kill whomever he had to kill," Tauber said.

The explanation Muhammad gave to his followers was that although it's important to honour a peace treaty, it was more important to cleanse Mecca of infidels.

The premise, which is still an integral belief of Islam, Tauber said, is that "if you are not strong enough, you are allowed to sign a peace treaty with the enemy. However, the minute you are strong enough, you are obliged to conquer the enemy by force – and this is accepted by all Islamic sects."

"If you are strong, they will respect you, and you can live in some sort of coexistence – not real peace, but a coexistence, in which you can at least be alive."

Even the Arabic word "salaam" which sounds so similar to the word "shalom," doesn't have the same meaning as its Hebrew counterpart, Tauber said.

The word "salaam" is more like a truce or ceasefire. It has a more temporary connotation. "According to Islam, a true peace is not possible," he said.

So where does that leave Israel?

"I do believe in the future of the State of Israel," Tauber said. "We must be strong, try our best to prevent the Iranians from obtaining nuclear power... [former U.S. president] George Bush saw that. [U.S. President Barack] Obama does not yet understand the Middle East."

Tauber was one of several speakers from Israel's main universities who came to Ottawa for the event, which took place Sept. 9 and 10.

Amit Gil-Bayaz, deputy head of mission at the Israeli Embassy of Israel, said that a variety of sessions were held in the "academic portion" of the 60-year celebration, and each featured a Canadian and an Israeli speaker, as well as a moderator. At the conclusion, there was an ambassadorial roundtable about representing one's country abroad.

In his address, Baird said Canada is looking forward to expanding Canada-Israel partnerships.

"Israel is today a country regarded around the world as a centre of culture, a hub of trade, and a voice of freedom and democracy, human rights and the rule of law," he said.

Baird said that the "strong ties" between Canada and Israel are a result of the Jewish state's "determination to reach out to partners around the world" and the "deliberate choice" by Israelis and Canadians to ally themselves involving matters of trade, arts and culture, defence and technology.

Baird cited facts about the two countries' economic links, including the Canada-Israel Free Trade Agreement – signed in 1997 – which last year saw $1.8 billion in "two-way merchandise trade," he said, adding that the two countries have now become part of each others "value chains."

Baird also said that Canada and Israel are working on a new customs agreement "to continue boosting business between our countries."

Tel Aviv mayor dismisses film fest protest

Despite opposition, all City to City tickets have been sold

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Ron Huldai, the three-term mayor of Tel Aviv, the world's first Hebrew-speaking city, chuckled as he dismissed a recent open letter that accused the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) of being "complicit in the Israeli propaganda machine."

"Tel Aviv is a symbol of democracy, tolerance and openness, a city of arts and culture," he said in an interview last week. "If this is propaganda, I'll take the blame."

Huldai, in Toronto on behalf of the Tel Aviv Foundation, was reacting to the so-called Toronto Declaration, which was drafted by a group of local residents objecting to the festival's City to City program, which focuses on Tel Aviv as it marks its 100th birthday.

Decrying Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip last winter, the protesters said that they objected "to the use of such an important international festival in staging a propaganda campaign" on behalf of what they claimed was "an apartheid regime."

Huldai said the City of City program was not affected by the protest and that all its tickets had been sold. "We're still on the right track," said Huldai, who attended a reception hosted here by Tel Aviv University's department of film and television.

He said that while the City to City program was initiated by the festival, the Israeli ministry of foreign affairs was involved as part of its Brand Israel media and advertising campaign, which was launched last year.

Saying that the program was the first by a major film festival to focus on Tel Aviv, Huldai said its purpose is to go beyond the Arab-Israeli conflict and show life as it really is in Israel today.

He added that neither he nor his staff met Cameron Bailey, its curator, during the visit to Israel to select the films for the program.

But Huldai bristled when he learned that Bailey, a co-director of the festival, had described Tel Aviv as "contested ground."

"I have a problem relating to that," said Huldai, a former combat pilot who has been mayor since 1998. "There is no dispute about the city of Tel Aviv. The founders of Tel Aviv bought the land. Only those who oppose Israel's existence can speak that way."

The 65-year-old mayor added, "Tel Aviv is a very vibrant, successful city which is celebrating its centennial with pride."

In a jab at the protesters, he said, "Toronto exists on the grounds of an Indian settlement."

Told that one of the organizers of the Toronto Declaration, writer and social activist Naomi Klein, is Jewish, Huldai said he was not surprised. "It was always in our history. I feel sorry for them." Nonetheless, he noted that he respects freedom of speech.

Similarly, he respects the decision of Canadian filmmaker John Greyson to withdraw his documentary, Covered, from the festival on the grounds that Israel's invasion of Gaza was "brutal."

"He had a right to pull his film, but I don't think it was the right thing to do. It's his problem."

In a related development, less than a dozen people turned out for a demonstration urging Leonard Cohen to cancel his Sept. 24 concert in Tel Aviv, held in the Plateau Mont-Royal where the singer-songwriter maintains a home.

The event, held Sept. 12, was organized by the pro-Palestinian group Tadamon, which supports an international call for a boycott of Israel.

Similar calls for Cohen to respect a boycott and not play in Israel have been held when Cohen performed earlier this year in Belfast, Liverpool and New York.

The Montreal-born Cohen, who turns 75 Sept. 21, is scheduled to give a concert at the Ramat Gan Stadium, his first performance in Israel since 1975. All 47,000 tickets sold out in less than a day last month at prices ranging from $90 to $315 (U.S.).

The concert will benefit Palestinian and Israeli peace groups, a decision Cohen made because of the boycott controversy.

Cohen, who is on his first world tour in 15 years, originally tried to find a compromise by playing in Ramallah in the Palestinian territories, as well Tel Aviv. But Palestinians threatened to boycott the concert if he also played in Israel.

Media decry attempt to bully film fest

The "Toronto Declaration" group's attempt to hijack the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) to serve its political agenda against Israel fell flat. Mainstream media uniformly and resoundingly rejected the ploy.

In "Protest off base" (Toronto Sun, Sept. 4), film critic Bruce Kirkland argued that art should be free from the intrusion of any group's political agenda.

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

"Art should encourage debate including on the complex Israeli-Palestinian question that so vexes the protesters – and not repress it through bully tactics and censorship," he wrote, adding: "I am not calling the protesters fascists, Nazis or even anti-Semites. I am calling them ignorant and ill-informed. They are playing politics with cinema. They are attacking a festival that, on screen, embodies the very essence of free speech and open debate."

In the Sept. 4 editorial "Artists for censorship," the Globe and Mail commended TIFF and its co-director Cameron Bailey for adamantly refusing to back down in the face of intimidation from the protest group, led by Canadian filmmaker John Greyson and author Naomi Klein.

The Globe noted that in "trying to treat Israel as a pariah among nations, the group would scorn anyone who does not accept its one-sided worldview. Capitulation to these self-appointed censors should not be an option."

The paper quoted Bailey's message on TIFF's website "'As the programmer of City To City, I was attracted to Tel Aviv… because the films made there explore and critique the city from many different perspectives… We will continue to screen the best films we can find from around the world.'"

The Globe concluded: "By refusing to be cowed, TIFF has stood up for artists everywhere."

The Toronto Star also had a strong editorial. In "Tel Aviv tiff at TIFF," (Sept. 8), it placed the protesters in the broader context of recent anti-Israel extremism.

"It is tempting to ignore this latest, tedious tiff over TIFF, spawned by a few dozen protesters who signed the petition. The anti-Israel diatribes are becoming a bore: Complaints against the Royal Ontario Museum for showing Israel's biblical Dead Sea Scrolls; 'Israel Apartheid Week' for high-minded student activists; CUPE locals calling for a boycott of Israeli academics; and the latest Pride parade featuring a float that attacked gay-friendly Israel for apartheid policies (ignoring other Middle Eastern regimes that persecute gays)

"Now TIFF is the target for those who would treat Israel as a pariah, demonize every aspect of its existence, and smear its supporters in Canada."

In "There's justice, then there's propaganda" (Globe and Mail Sept. 10) Canadian filmmaker Robert Lantos exposed Klein's distortions of the historical record about Tel Aviv, distortions that appear to be serving a broader purpose – the delegitimization of Israel itself. Lantos' way of putting this was blunt: Klein and her gang, he wrote, "are clamouring for nothing short of the annihilation of the Jewish state."

None of the commentaries – and there were others – was swayed by the protesters' denial that they were trying to censor or boycott the Tel Aviv films, only the focus on the city. After all, it's hypocritical for Klein to deny engineering a boycott when she's at the forefront of an international campaign to impose a boycott, divestment and sanctions (BDS) action against Israel.

In "Israel: Boycott, Divest, Sanction" (The Nation, Jan. 7) Klein argued that the "reason the BDS strategy should be tried against Israel [instead of any other country such as the United States or Britain for their actions in Iraq and Afghanistan] is practical: in a country so small and trade-dependent, it could actually work." Thus Klein, the purported champion of social justice, admitted to being a bully.

Inflicting this bullying on Toronto's internationally esteemed film festival roused widespread disgust in Toronto media circles. Call this what it is: a victory for decency and common sense.

Hamilton shul gets new cantor

By HOLLY GINSLER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Rebecca Moses is the new cantor-educator for Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom.

Invested as a cantor this past May, she has also taught children in various capacities for much of her adult life, so she is well prepared to take on her two new roles.

Moses grew up in San Antonio, Texas, and prides herself on being a seventh-generation Jewish Texan. There aren't many of them.

Her home congregation in San Antonio, which is about 150 years old, had never had a cantor in its entire history up until last year when Moses got the position.

She is the daughter of two hippies, she said. Her father was a research scientist and her mother was an English teacher. When at age 15 she made the decision to become a cantor, her parents weren't sure what to make of it. It was her form of rebellion.

Cantor Rebecca Moses

The catalyst came when her synagogue brought in a guest cantor for the Shabbat of Songs, when she was 15. She had never heard a cantor sing, and it awakened a longing in her. "This woman got to do everything that I was learning how to love… sing at the synagogue, teach, study, meet new people, and get to do it all in a Jewish context," she said.

To enter cantorial school, Moses needed an undergraduate degree, which she started at the University of North Texas. However, she ended up returning to San Antonio and her job at Magik Children's Theatre, a professional theatre company that puts on 10 to 20 children's plays a year.

During the next three years, Moses continued her studies at the University of Missouri, Kansas City Conservatory of Music, completing a bachelor of music in vocal performance.

In 2004, she and her fiancé, Aaron, moved to Jerusalem, where she began her five-year voyage to become a cantor. She spent the first year in cantorial, rabbinic and education programs at the Hebrew Union College in Jerusalem. Then the couple moved back to New York, where she continued her studies for the next four years. She was invested as a cantor in 2009. "I got to study with unbelievable professors, my classmates and I are really close, and I had a fabulous time learning all the things that I'd always wanted to learn," she said.

She held three part-time student internship positions as a cantor: at Union Temple in Brooklyn, N.Y., for two years; in Stanford, Conn., for one year; and Pittsfield, Mass., for two years.

Moses vividly remembers her first experience as a cantorial soloist when she was 17. She was performing at an adult bat mitzvah and was nervous for the first 10 minutes. But when she looked out at the congregation, she realized that "they wanted me to be there, they wanted to listen, they wanted to sing along, they wanted that music," she said.

As she learned more about the liturgy and understood more about what she was saying, Moses reached a point when she stopped just singing and started leading prayers. It was a magical turning point for her. She said she appreciated how different this experience was from performing as a character on a stage. Being a cantor let her have the best parts of her "former life" as an actress in musical theatre without having the negative aspects of being in the professional theatre world, she said. She feels lucky to have found her niche in life. Even if she's had a bad week when everything has gone wrong, singing on Shabbat with the community makes everything right again, she said.

Former Jewish farm and resort now historic site

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Once upon a time there was a Jewish farmer who lived in a French-Canadian village in an old stone house by the river.

Every summer for decades, Jewish families from Montreal came to share in his idyllic existence, staying in little cabins the farmer built on his acreage.

That farmer was Harry Schwartzman, an immigrant from Bessarabia, who, with his wife Dora Bernstein, bought the house in St. Charles-Borromée, near Joliette, in 1924. The house, dating back to 1844, would stay in the family until 1965.

The town, which now has a population of about 12,000, is recognizing the role the Schwartzman family, and the small Jewish community that used to lived in the Joliette area, played in its history.

The house was declared a heritage site 40 years ago and was bought by the town in 1989 for use as a cultural centre. It is known as Maison Antoine-Lacombe, after its first owner, and is now surrounded by spectacular gardens.

As part of the 20th anniversary celebrations of the town's acquisition of the property, local volunteer Gisèle Tétrault undertook to research the house's Schwartzman era, which until now had been a major gap in the house's friends' recollection of its past.

She interviewed some of the Schwartzmans' descendants, and the result is a 35-page bilingual booklet that was launched at the Maison last month. The event reunited some of the area's former year-round and seasonal Jewish residents, or their relatives.

The Maison also hosted an exhibition of archival photos of the resort and paintings by Harry's grandson, David Schwartzman of Montreal, inspired by his memories of the house and life on the farm, which fronted on l'Assomption River.

The Maison is installing a permanent plaque on the property, attesting to this important chapter in the house's history.

Quebec Jewish Congress, especially its immediate past president Victor Goldbloom, who chaired the event, was instrumental in reconnecting St. Charles-Borromée and the Schwartzman clan.

Resort is a fanciful name for a place that for most of its history had no running water or electricity and expected its guests to pitch in with the farm work. But it was popular mainly with working people, most refugees like Schwartzman, who would escape the heat and overcrowding of the city.

Up to 50 families came each summer; mothers and children often spent the whole season, while the fathers came up on weekends.

The Jewish presence in the Joliette area, heart of the region known today as Lanaudière, is less known than that in the Laurentians further north and was never as strong.

Joliette as a holiday destination may have been attractive because it was closer, about 50 kms northeast of Montreal, but also because there was never the anti-Semitism that was prevalent in Ste. Agathe, David Schwartzman said. "We never heard anything negative," he said.

That may be partly explained by the everyday relations the Jews who lived there permanently and spoke French had with their neighbours.

Tétrault noted that when architectural historian Jocelyne Martineau undertook a study for Les Amis de la Maison Antoine-Lacombe in 1994, she was not able to track down the Schwartzman descendants. Tétrault met David and his sister Margie Black two years ago and recorded their memories of their summers at the resort, adding the reminiscences of other relatives. The translation into French was done by David's wife Penina.

David and Margie's father Bennie, one of the four children of Dora and Harry, was born and raised on the farm and attended the local French school. A small permanent Jewish population lived in the Joliette area during this period, although little has been written about them, David said.

"In the centre of Joliette there is a large war memorial on which several Jewish names appear, reflecting the presence of a meaningful Jewish population in the area.

"I would like to see these Jewish soldiers remembered this fall, both as a testament to their sacrifice and to help illustrate how Jews were well integrated within many small towns in Quebec."

As Tétrault's history says, a number of Jewish families, mostly from eastern Europe and Russia, settled in the area in the early 20th century. Harry Schwartzman first lived in Montreal, where he married Lithuanian-born Dora. They bought a plot of land in St. Charles-Borromée in 1917, following in the footsteps of several other Jewish immigrants who bought land there before World War I.

Harry came from an agricultural background, but had not been permitted, as a Jew, to own land in the old country, David said.

After buying the house and farm in 1924, Harry began growing tobacco and later potatoes and raising livestock, eventually cultivating about 200 acres.

He soon began building about 40 cabins, called "Schwartzman Cottages," to rent out. Sometimes families doubled or tripled up in them to save money. A one-room chalet was $100 for the season; two rooms cost $150.

At the beginning of the season, trucks were hired to bring up all household necessities such as bedding and utensils, with two or three families sharing the cost of each transport. Sometimes, the families would ride up in the truck bed themselves, sitting on their boxes.

The resort was a self-contained village with its own general store with a back room used as a synagogue, remembers David, 61, who spent every summer there. There was even a dance hall.

His grandfather brought in the drinking water and picked up the garbage in his horse-drawn cart.

The men who came up on Friday evenings for the weekend came by bus. Few had cars, at least in the '30s and '40s and they would bring with them kosher food.

Harry, who always drove a Chevrolet, his son William recalls, made a weekly trip to Montreal to pick up supplies.

His goal now is to have the exhibition that closed at Maison Antoine-Lacombe on Aug. 20 mounted in Montreal, so others can have a sense of those glorious days so long ago.

David Schwartzman and Gisèle Tétrault stand outside Maison Antoine-Lacombe in St. Charles-Borromée, near Joliette. It used to be his grandfather's farm house and its environs a popular Jewish resort in the 1930s, '40s and '50s.

Winnipeg Holocaust education centre rededicated

BY MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It was a double celebration for the Freeman Family Foundation Holocaust Education Centre of the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada last month.

The 10-year-old Holocaust education centre celebrated the rededication of its newly renovated museum at the Asper Jewish Community Campus on Aug. 30, as well as the unveiling of the new Rabbi Peretz Weizman Holocaust Education Display Case at the entrance of the museum.

"We want to thank the Asper Foundation, the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba, the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg and our many donors and supporters who have helped create this model for Holocaust education," said Charles Sitwell, the Jewish Heritage Centre's president.

Barbara Goszer, a Holocaust survivor who came to Winnipeg as a war orphan, expressed her pride and pleasure at the rededication of the Holocaust education centre. She spoke about the early days of Holocaust education in Winnipeg and Manitoba.

"I joined the [Jewish Federation of Winnipeg's] Holocaust awareness committee in 1992," Goszer recalled.

At that time, the committee's responsibilities were principally Shoah-week programming and some programs in the synagogues, she said. "We did very little outreach in terms of Holocaust education," she said.

That changed when the late Hersh Zentner, a teacher, proposed a Holocaust education program – with a speakers' bureau in Manitoba schools. "Hersh was the ideal person to lead this program," Goszer said. "He was a teacher with an interest in the Holocaust."

Zentner would do an initial presentation to the classes, after which a Holocaust survivor spoke about his or her experiences.

In June 1995, the construction of the Asper Campus began, and Holocaust awareness committee co-chair Edith Kimelman asked if a Holocaust education centre was included in the plans.

"We were told about the plans for a Jewish museum at the campus and asked if there would be some space for a Holocaust education centre as well," Goszer said.

She pressed home the request at the Negev Gala that June, which honoured Holocaust survivors 50 years after the war ended. "I announced at the gala that we were getting the space," Goszner said.

"We turned to our fellow Holocaust orphans to raise the funds for the centre. We reached out to them all over. Zoltan and Yetta Freeman became the major patrons. Zoltan was one of us.

"He moved from here to Montreal and later to Hamilton. He lives in Toronto now. We kept in touch over the years," she added.

The Holocaust education centre's chair Belle Millo said that thousands of young people's worldviews have been changed by the centre's programming.

She said that the Holocaust education centre has two main functions: to honour the Holocaust victims and survivors and to further Zentner's work in bringing Holocaust education to Manitoba teens.

She said the centre's annual symposium at the University of Winnipeg's Duckworth Centre attracts more than 1,000 Manitoba high school students every year.

Millo announced that the centre is launching a Holocaust resource book for schools, with photos, documents and eyewitness accounts by Winnipeg Holocaust survivors.

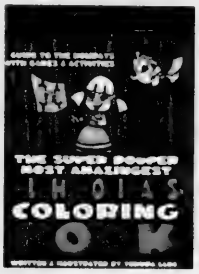
Yehuda Lang always liked to colour.

Born and raised in Toronto, he's been drawing ever since he could hold a crayon. His interest in art led him to the Ontario College of Art and Design, and in 2007, he launched 8thAvenueCreative.com with a focus on illustration, graphic design and web design.



His love for art and his passion for Judaism also inspired him to create The Super Dooper Most Amazingest Coloring Books, giving children an outlet to express their creativity through Jewish art.

"With colouring books, kids can feel like it's their picture, not someone else's," Lang says.

Following a successful run with both Purim and Pesach colouring books, Lang has released The Super Dooper Most Amazingest High Holidays Coloring Book.

"The colouring books are a great way for children, no matter what level of religious observance, to get involved in the holidays in a fun and educational way," he says.

With 32 whimsical illustrations, a playful storyline with a humorous touch, and friendly characters that walk kids through the High Holidays from Rosh Hashanah to Sukkot, they're also storybooks that your child will want to read over and over again.

Aimed at readers aged three to 10, they're available in Judaica stores and select kosher grocery stores in Canada and the United States. For more information, visit www.superdoopermostamazingest.com, or call 647-262-1848.

Rabbi Weizman 'pillar of community'

She also spoke about Rabbi Weizman's contribution to the Winnipeg community.

"Throughout my lifetime, rabbis have come and gone, but Rabbi Weizman has remained a constant," she said. "He has been a pillar of the community and, as a Holocaust survivor himself, holds a special place in the hearts of the survivors here. He has been a natural leader who never hesitated to speak out about the horrors of the Holocaust."

Also addressing the audience were Rabbi Weizman; Anita Neville, MP for Winnipeg South Centre; Christine Melnick, Manitoba's minister of water stewardship and a strong supporter of the State of Israel; and Winnipeg Mayor Sam Katz, who is the son of Holocaust survivors.

Survivor wins N.S. honour for Shoah education work

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Holocaust survivor and Shoah educator Philip Riteman says he's "deeply honoured" to have been named to the Order of Nova Scotia, his province's highest honour.

"You never expect this, but it's nice to be recognized," Riteman said. "This is a great province in which to live."

The 84-year-old resident of Bedford, N.S., near Halifax, has devoted the last 20 years of his life to speaking with audiences, mostly youth, about his wartime experiences.

Riteman was among five people chosen for the honour this year from 79 nominations across the province. He will be recognized at Province House in Halifax at an Oct. 7 ceremony.

Riteman survived four years in the Buchenwald and Auschwitz concentration camps from 1942 to 1945, coming to Canada after World War II to develop a successful business in Newfoundland. He moved to Halifax in the 1960s.

Twenty years ago, he started speaking about the Holocaust and has since spread his message of "love thy neighbour, don't hate him or her" to thousands and thousands of children and adults.

"I don't hate anyone," he tells people when asked about his feelings today. "I just want you to know you should never hate anyone the way the Jews were hated in my youth. Make sure what happened to me doesn't happen to anyone else."

Riteman, who spent his high school years in the camps, has received several diplomas when speaking at high school graduations. He has also received honorary degrees from Memorial University of Newfoundland and St. Thomas University in Fredericton, N.B.

Two months ago, Riteman was one of four survivors to speak to a group of teachers' at St. Thomas who were learning about the Holocaust so they could teach their students.

"There was Israel Unger [of Fredericton], Lilly Falk and Helena Jockel [both of Halifax]," said Riteman's wife, Dorothy. "It was a very emotional and worthwhile session."

She said of her husband, "Whoever calls him, he goes if he can. He doesn't refuse. He's done a lot over the years."

After the High Holidays, Riteman will speak to eight schools in Newfoundland and at a community function that he thinks might draw more than 5,000 to a hockey arena near St. John's.

The Order of Nova Scotia was established in June 2001 to honour people who "have made significant contributions and given outstanding service to their communities and the province."

Philip Riteman of Bedford, N.S., was recently named to the Order of Nova Scotia. Last spring, after speaking to a high school, he was presented with a plaque describing his life. [Creative Memories® Memory Manager photo]

Sutton Group Admiral blazes new trails in real estate

Murray Goldkind
Broker of Record

Using a simple formula of maximizing opportunity and minimizing hassle for its agents, Sutton Group Admiral Realty has experienced the kind of spectacular growth that has surpassed even its own high expectations.

The record-breaking sales achieved by its ever-growing team, which now numbers over 220 agents, has allowed Sutton Group Admiral to not only consolidate its niche atop the residential resale market, but also to enter the highly competitive field of new home construction sales.

Brokers Of Record and co-owners Saul and Murray Goldkind pride themselves on their ability to read and respond to the needs of home buyers and sellers. Says Murray: "Today's home buyers are looking for one thing: VALUE. The agents and brokers who give them maximum value for their hard-earned dollars will earn their business. Those who don't, won't." And implicit in this value, he notes, is the quality of service provided by the broker or agent. "If you have to do more than say, 'I'll take the red one,' we're not doing our job."

In its dual capacity as reseller and new home purveyor, Sutton Group Admiral's access to both resale homes and new construction allows it to offer home buyers the best of both worlds, says Sol. "Whether you're looking for a resale home or a new one, you can now explore ALL your interests and options with us."

One thing that hasn't changed, says Sol, is Sutton Group Admiral's commitment to work "24 hours a day to earn your trust and ensure your satisfaction."

Israeli veterans enjoy 24th visit to Montreal

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — For the 24th straight year and with little fanfare, a group of 10 disabled Israeli soldiers recently spent a couple of weeks in Montreal and its environs under bright sunshine, rejuvenating both their spirits and their souls.

"The moment we landed, the sun came out 14 days in a row!" laughed Brig.-Gen. Eitan Matmon in a telephone interview on the eve of the group's return to Israel late last week.

The annual visit was sponsored by the 25-year-old Beit Halochem Canada (Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel), which raises funds for Israel's Beit Halochem, a network of centres that provide therapy and support to more than 51,000 disabled vets and victims of terror.

Matmon, now 45, recounted how he has been wounded several times, most recently in 2004 in Gaza, and as far back as 1982 in a bomb explosion in Lebanon.

"We are 10 people here, but the youngest is 22 and the oldest 60. Girls too, who were in a terrorist attack."

As usual, the visit was kept under wraps for security reasons until just before the group left to return home. But Matmon said that for a couple of the participants, the trip was the first time since their injuries that he was able to witness a revival of their human spirit.

"In Israel, they never talked, never laughed. I saw that here for the first time."

The official highlight of the trip was reserved for the final evening, Sept. 9, when the group got to see young Montreal jazz singing sensation Nikki Yanofksy perform at a Beit Halochem Canada fundraiser at Oscar Peterson Hall on the Concordia University Loyola campus.

But there were other occasions whose highlights, while less official, still seemed to resonate with the visitors. Most disabled veterans, Matmon noted, can't work because of their injuries, yet, according to an individual who helped the group during the visit, they still managed to scrabble together funds to give to the fragile Bagg Street synagogue and to a High Holiday basket fund.

"They spontaneously did it," the individual said.

For the first time, a Sephardi synagogue Petah Tikvah in St. Laurent – served as host congregation.

Besides touring city landmarks such as the Olympic Stadium, Mount Royal, the "underground city," and the like, the group, who were billeted with local families, also met with Jewish community leaders and visited community sites.

Matmon said they particularly enjoyed chatting with students at Jewish schools, including both UTT-Herzliah campuses, Bialik High School, Hebrew Academy and l'École Maïmonide.

Another highlight was meeting with the legendary Royal 22nd Regiment – the "Van Doos" – who have seen a number of their brethren fall in Afghanistan.

The vets also got a chance to go to Quebec City and Ottawa, where they were hosted by longtime friends of Beit Halochem Canada, Dorothy Nodolny and Ruth Aaron.

For Matmon, the trip was an essential part of the veterans' overall rehabilitation.

"They are thought of as 'disabled,' but they will carry on the flag to the next generation," he said.

North Bay shul declared a heritage building

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The 84-year-old Sons of Jacob Synagogue in North Bay, Ont. – the oldest synagogue north of Toronto still being used as a place of worship – was recognized earlier this summer by the North Bay Municipal Heritage Committee as a heritage building.

Located in downtown North Bay, the synagogue has been holding regular services and operating as a Hebrew school since 1925, the year North Bay was incorporated as a city.

The building was constructed in 1913, and until 1925, it was used as a grocery store, a wallpaper and picture frame outlet and as a retail store for furniture and hard goods.

On July 14, members of the Jewish and wider communities gathered at the shul, which has a membership of 20 families (who account for most of the city's Jews), to witness the unveiling of a commemorative plaque that was hung on an outside wall.

Herb Brown, the shul's president, was born and raised in North Bay and started going to the shul regularly when the synagogue was founded in 1925, mostly by eastern European immigrants.

"My parents were early settlers in North Bay. My father was a tailor and he settled in North Bay – I don't know the exact year – but it was around 1915," Brown said.

"He came from Russia. He was probably in his late teens when he arrived in Canada… They believed when they came to shul that you really davened and you did your duty and it was quite a different atmosphere than what you find in shuls today."

Brown added that he used to regularly attend the shul's Talmud Torah, the Hebrew school, which was taught by a rabbi.

He said that although the Jewish community acquired the building to use as a synagogue in 1925, it wasn't until 1947 that it was renovated to look like a shul.

"We had proper pews and a very nice bimah."

The Jewish community has continued to maintain the synagogue ever since, but in 2007, the congregation suffered a devastating blow when a burst water pipe flooded the sanctuary and caused $150,000 worth of damage.

The bimah and the ark that held the synagogue's three Torah scrolls was destroyed and had to be rebuilt, but fortunately, the scrolls themselves suffered no damage.

Marty Brown, the shul's treasurer and Herb Brown's son, said that much of the cost for repairs was covered by insurance, but the settlement wasn't enough to repair the roof and siding.

The younger Brown, who said that the shul has been a part of his life since 1951, "when I had my bris," said he was overwhelmed with the support that North Bay's Jewish community received from the rest of the city's 54,000 residents.

Despite having their own financial burdens, nearby churches raised funds to help the Jewish community pay for repairs to the 96-year-old building's roof, which was replaced just last month.

"They were raising funds for us, because they want to make sure that there is a synagogue here, as hard as that is to believe," he said.

"I mean, where else would that happen? We're very lucky."

The elder Brown also acknowledged the fact that North Bay Jews have a "very good rapport" with the non-Jewish community.

"After the damage to the shul, the non-Jewish churches came to our assistance without any requests or anything, and a lot of individuals that brought in sizable amounts. We had an elderly non-Jewish woman who gave us $5,000," he said.

"My wife happened to be in the [shul] office one morning when two ladies came in, and we had received a very nice donation from the [St. Andrews] United Church, but these ladies brought in another donation from the United Church. A bunch of the girls had a bake sale, and they brought us in $650 from the bake sale for repairs to the shul," Brown recalled.

"She took the cheque and heard their story, and when she came to me she had tears in her eyes."

As if the donations weren't enough to illustrate the community's backing, the Browns were thrilled when they learned the shul was being recognized as a heritage site.

"The people of North Bay recognized how important it was to have a synagogue in the community," the younger Brown said.

"It's amazing how many phone calls we got of support, knowing that we had the flood a couple years ago. Obviously being recognized as a heritage site shows that the community values it and so many people just wanted us to know that they would continue to support us."

While Jewish communities in other small Northern Ontario towns have declined because of the lure of the big city, the Browns are proud to be part of a Jewish community that's still active.

"We are fortunate that we have a few professional people that are interested in Judaism and they take an interest in our Talmud Torah," the elder Brown said, adding that two Jewish North Bay doctors each have four children, all of whom attend the shul's Hebrew school.

"They are spending their own dollars bringing in a teacher each weekend, and a few weeks ago, the children put on a Friday night service, and it was very well done. Any synagogue would have been proud of them," he said.

"In a small city like North Bay with so few Jewish people, it was wonderful to see that we still give our children a first-class Jewish education."

Members of both the Jewish and non-Jewish community gathered at the Sons of Jacob Synagogue in North Bay in July for the unveiling of a plaque that recognizes the shul as a heritage building. [Howard Kizell photo]

LEARN TO SKATE

We are happy to offer our participants a
One Day per week Learn to Skate Program
Unlike other programs, you no longer have to worry about struggling through rush hour traffic to make your child's weeknight classes, especially in the heart of winter.

Our Learn to Skate Program has been in operation for over a decade. It teaches the fundamentals of skating, including balance, proper strides, stopping and much more. We feature group lessons, but unlike other programs, we have several qualified instructors on hand to teach and supervise the children. The program will take place at Pavilion in Thornhill. This is a newly built arena, so the facilities are first rate. The skaters will enjoy the usage of heated changerooms & great ice, while the parents can enjoy a warm view of the ice in the upstairs restaurant, and enjoy the ample parking spaces.

The skaters are divided into groups based on ability and age. Classes are catered to ages 3-10, however all classes can apply to older children as well.

Dates, Times & Information
Sundays: 9-week program: Oct. 18 to Dec. 13
Sundays: 9-week program: Jan. 10 to March 7
Sundays: 18-week program: Oct. 18 to March 7
Cost: $125 for 9 week session, and $200 for 18 week session 9:15am (45 minute session) or
10:00am (45 minute session)

Safety is a large component of our program, so it's mandatory to bring a hockey helmet. Face masks, elbow pads and shin pads are also recommended. Gloves, winter jackets and pants are essential for kids.

Raspberries developed by Israeli Canadian grown worldwide

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL21C

A desert climate may not be conducive to growing raspberries, but one of the world's top raspberry and strawberry breeders hails from scorching Israel.

Research scientist Chaim Kempler of the Pacific Agri-Food Research Centre, works in Agassiz, B.C., for Agriculture Canada. Many of the world's most popular berry varieties pass through the hands of Kempler, a plant breeder whose training started in Israel decades ago.

Born in 1946 to a Polish Jewish family, Kempler first studied horticulture and agriculture at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and then became a lab technician at the Volcani Center of Agricultural Research in Rehovot, a government-run agriculture institute known the world over for its plant-breeding programs. There, he worked on peppers.

By the age of 30, Kempler had the itch to advance his career and moved to Canada with his wife and two sons to attend the University of Guelph. He almost immediately started working for Agriculture Canada to improve small berry varieties for sustainable production in the Pacific Northwest regions of Oregon and Washington state, and Canada.

Since then, the Israeli Canadian has been successfully hunting for and breeding new raspberry, strawberry and blueberry varieties for about 31 years. Kempler speaks Hebrew and English, but gives the berries Native American names.

How about a special red raspberry called the Ukee, named for the First Nations people from Ucluelet, a small town on the west coast of Vancouver Island? There are others called Chilliwack, Skeena and Chilcotin, and strawberries known as Totem.

Kempler doesn't think that First Nation names are strange at all. It's a tradition, he told ISRAEL21c – one that he's continued from his Canadian predecessor at the research centre, and it's something that plant breeders do in Israel, too.

"All our varieties are named using First Nation words," he said. "This is to make them unique and recognizable that they come from those regions."

In Israel, he added, "Different varieties of strawberries are named using women's names. There is Dorit, a kind of strawberry, for example."

Kempler said he likes the Hebrew word for berries. "It's parote ya'ar, which translates to 'fruit of the forest.' Isn't it lovely?"

So far, about 12 new berry varieties have been cultivated by Kempler, among them the most popular raspberries in the world.

He does not modify the berries genetically, but rather finds certain traits in nature and mixes these "wild" genes into the gene pool of cultivated varieties. Part of his job requires field work in nature to find naturally occurring varieties that can be bred with the cultivated ones.

Kempler aims to not only create hearty and tasty varieties of berries but also berries that are environmentally friendly. "We develop varieties that are resistant to disease and insects and which are reducing the impact on the environment. Because [with our varieties] the farmer will use less chemicals, the environment will benefit, the consumer will benefit and the farmer will benefit," he said.

It can take 10 to 15 years to perfect a new variety of berry plant. Some are bred to be tolerant to fungus, to taste like wild berries or to produce bigger fruit.

One major concern for berry growers in the Pacific region of the United States is the bushy dwarf virus, which is transmitted through pollen. Until new berry varieties are exposed to real-life conditions, there is no way to know which ones will be better able to resist the fungus. This is one of the reasons it can take so long to develop a new variety.

Kempler's history with berries started a long time ago. At least that's what his mother, a Holocaust survivor who fled to Israel, told him. She recalled that he ate raspberries in Europe as a boy.

"When I lived in Israel, I never had raspberries or at least not that I remember," said Kempler, who is currently working with an Israeli breeder, Shmuel Zilkah, at the Volcani Institute to develop a breed of berries suitable for the Israeli climate.

Russian immigrants to Israel are familiar with the sweet and tangy taste of raspberries and look for them in supermarkets. But they are hard to find and tend to be expensive.

"It's a desirable crop to grow," Kempler said. "If you can grow them, you can get very good prices, and now several growers are trying to grow [our varieties] in the Galilee and Ramat HaGolan regions in Israel."

Kempler's hard work is paying off for Canada and parts of the world where raspberries are loved. "Some of the varieties we've grown are the most popular in the world, and have become very successful internationally," he said.

"[Our berries] are grown all over Europe mainly for the high-quality fruit and flavour."

AJWS: 'Building a better world'

By AMY KLEIN
JTA

Shortly after a failed mayoral bid in New York City ended her political career in 1997, Ruth Messinger became president of the American Jewish World Service (AJWS), an international human rights organization that works to alleviate poverty, hunger and disease in the developing world.

Since then, the organization has seen its annual budget jump from $2 million to $29 million. It distributes about $13 million in grants each year to more than 400 grassroots projects around the world and has sent 3,000 Jewish volunteers overseas.

Messinger, who was recently appointed to the White House Task Force on Global Poverty, talked with JTA about the challenges of globalization, the reasons why young people are inspired to take part in her organization's trips and why she thinks Jews should be involved in fixing the world – not just their own communities.

The following is an edited and condensed transcript of the interview.

JTA: Some have criticized western countries for dumping money on places like Africa and creating a culture of dependence there. How does AJWS work to avoid that?

Messinger: There are one billion people in the world who have nothing and make less than a dollar a day. If someone doesn't help them, they'll remain dirt poor and ravaged by disease. So it's our imperative to help them.

The worst thing in the world is to just give food or used clothing – that could not be more culturally inappropriate. The instinct all too often is for people to clean their closets, without understanding needs. A month after the tsunami, the highest point in Sri Lanka was a mountain of American blankets!

We're offering funds for a specific purpose where we've been asked by the community. This way they can, for example, practise drip irrigation – which, by the way, most people in the world learn from Israel – so they can take other steps [to gain nutritional independence], which is encouraging to both the people on the ground and to us. We work with our community of activists – 70,000 advocates – to urge better U.S. policy. The U.S. government funds American farmers to grow surplus food and dump the surplus in the developing countries – that's undercutting local farmers, that's encouraging dependence, not independence. That's bad American policy.

JTA: How does the Jewish community react to an organization that spends a great deal of resources helping non-Jews?

Messinger: We wouldn't have built a list of 70,000 activists or 3,000 alumni and face a demand for more service programs if people weren't attracted to our mission. Part of being Jewish is to put Jewish values into practice where the poorest people are. This is not some new piece of Judaism. The rabbis and Jewish leaders have discussed the balance between helping Jews and non-Jews, the balance of working with different communities, the balance of showing who we are and building a better world not only ourselves but for others. It doesn't say, "Build justice for Jews."

JTA: Why do you think AJWS missions appeal to younger Jews?

Messinger: I don't think it's surprising that many young people – but not just young people – are interested in finding out the makeup of the entire world. The global changes of the last decade have helped people understand that we are all dependent on each other. What happens in one place has repercussions around the world. Congregations ask me to come and speak: what's our position in the broader world, what's the Jewish lens in understanding that? What does it mean in 2009 to help heal the world and how shall we use our history and our position as educated, influential players to try and make a difference?

JTA: AJWS is kind of like a Jewish peace corps, assisting developing countries. Is the volunteer work important for the countries themselves or more for the volunteers?

Messinger: The projects that engage with us want 15 volunteers. They understand that more hands will get more work done faster. The projects with the community might have been put aside, their lives taken up with their own farming, with their own efforts to earn $1 or $2 a day. They are so appreciative of having someone volunteer because a library needs a roof. They recognize the value of having young Americans in Uganda or Thailand or India or El Salvador, having their communities see that there are people from the West, from America, from the Jewish community, that care about them and care about being helpful. I want the volunteers to understand the Jewish mandate for social justice, I want them to have direct personal experience in the developing world where they live and make friends, where they understand other people in other countries so they will come back to America and write about it and talk about it in the Jewish community, in their Jewish community.

JTA: With so many challenges facing the Jewish community right now – education funding, assimilation, intermarriage – how can helping developing countries be a priority?

Messinger: The American community has serious problems now, and the Jewish community has some particular problems of our own. On the other hand, this is a community that has the experience of being an outsider, and we know what happens when no one responds, when you call for help and no one's there. Comparatively, we are a prosperous, affluent and influential community, and we want to be sure that Jews think about helping those that haven't gotten to that level, as well as working in the Jewish community, too. There's time and space and energy for all of that.

JTA: You have said it's important for Jews to be seen doing this kind of work. Why?

Messinger: It helps people in the rest of the world who have never met a Jew, or have never heard of the Jewish religion. It's important for them to see Jews in precisely the way we ought to be seen – as people committed to social justice, coming into their communities and working with their local people to help get work done.

Still likely stuck with payments

Family Matters

by John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Counsel
Garfin Zeidenberg LLP
Family Lawyer & Mediator for 28 years

Question: I signed a separation agreement for child support in 1998. It said I had to pay $600 monthly for child support. My income has gone up since then. There's nothing in the agreement that says I have to show my ex-wife any proof of my income changes each year.

Now she says that I owe her in arrears an increase under the Child Support Guideline tables. I'm willing to pay more starting now but I don't have $53,000 for the time she never asked about until now. It just isn't there. Who's right?

Answer: If you lived in Alberta, she would definitely be right. In Ontario, she's still probably right even though our own Court of Appeal in one recent decision (Walsh) ruled that pending trial, you wouldn't have to pay the increase because there was nothing in your agreement that obligated you to disclose your income from year to year. At trial, you would still likely be stuck with retroactive payments.

However, for many payers Walsh was a "lifesaver" because trials in family law are expensive and don't happen as often anymore. They settle or die well before trial. Some Ontario courts have ruled that it would be unfair to burden a payer with a retroactive increase in a large lump sum if the mother waited for several years or even for a period of time prior to commencing her court action before asking a judge to "pounce" on the payer with a large retroactive sum.

(One judge ordered less retroactively because the mother's letter requesting exposure may not have reached the payer and she never "followed up" until starting her lawsuit).

However, if the agreement does contain a clause that obligates the payer to disclose tax returns and other evidence of income from year to year, then the retroactive payments would be ordered, even before trial. Most importantly, legal scholars and senior family law lawyers today agree that recent Alberta Court of Appeal decision recently released is so thorough and persuasive that it will likely be adopted by our own courts in Ontario, even though the decision does not technically bind them.

The decision is revolutionary. It sweeps aside all technical objections. If your income increased, then you should have contacted your ex and started paying that much more under Child Support Guideline tables, even if the original separation agreement is silent on the issue of timely disclosure. So payers, start paying or you will pay interest. And recipients, start calculating what you are owed.

On behalf of my family, and all of us at Garfin Zeidenberg, I wish you and your family a happy and healthy New Year.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

'They' are taught to hate

By STEPHEN SCHEINBERG

Guest Voice

Recently a good friend posed a challenge to me. I suppose that my regular insistence that the government of Israel was thwarting any movement toward peace irritated him. His strategy was to cut to the basics, and he asked: "How can there be any real peace if the Palestinians continue to teach their children to hate Israel and its citizens?"

In other words, let us suppose that Israel, with the best of good will, signed a peace treaty; could this overcome the hatred that "their" children are imbued with? It is not a question to be answered lightly, and it demands an informed response.

Stephen Scheinberg

First, hatred is a serious problem, among both Israelis and Palestinians.

A 2007 survey conducted by University of Haifa researchers revealed the extent of this malaise. Eight hundred Israeli, Jewish high school students from 11 schools showed a deep contempt for Arabs. Seventy-five per cent said that Arabs were "uneducated" and the same number said they were "uncivilized." Shockingly, 74 per cent responded that they were "unclean." That constitutes clear, unadulterated racism. I had reacted negatively to a widely distributed video from journalist Max Blumenthal that showed the nasty racism of Israeli youth through select interviews in which they attacked not only Arabs but the skin colour of U.S. President Barack Obama. I believe you can find such louts in front of the clubs in any city of the world.

However, the poll results indicate that Blumenthal's sample may not have been unrepresentative. That same poll showed that Israeli Arab students were also racist but not at quite as high a level as their Jewish counterparts.

I have not been able to locate a similar study of Palestinian youth in the West Bank and Gaza. Israeli propagandists have focused not on their opinions but on the textbooks they are exposed to. The Center for Monitoring the Impact of Peace (CMIP), a group that seems more interested in undermining rather than furthering peace efforts, has fuelled the debate.

Akiva Eldar of Ha'aretz has described CMIP's founder Itamar Marcus: "In recent years, Marcus has been making a living translating and disseminating defamatory communications against Israel, extracted by his staff from Palestinian publications... Marcus' centre routinely feeds the media with excerpts from 'Palestinian' textbooks that call for Israel's annihilation."

Marcus' methods have come under serious fire from Prof. Nathan Brown of George Washington University who contends that most of the words cited by Marcus were taken from the old Egyptian and Jordanian texts and not the newer Palestinian ones. Brown's own conclusion was more optimistic, that the newer "books certainly contained material unfriendly to Israel, but they did not attack its existence or veer into anti-Semitism."

In their joint project, Prof. Ruth Finer of Hebrew University of Jerusalem and Prof. Sami Adwan of Bethlehem University examined 13 Israeli and nine Palestinian texts in history and civics. Not surprisingly, the texts were almost mirror images of one another. Each celebrates only its own victims, and ignores the human suffering of the other. This is corroborated by the findings of Prof. David Bar-Tal of Hebrew University, who found that in 124 Israeli textbooks, Arabs are presented as "primitive," "cruel" and "riffraff."

So, perhaps that is enough of mutual charges of racism and cultivating hatred. Neither side has a monopoly on hatred, and both could do more to eliminate it. Yet, while I believe that education has an important role to play, and that parents and peers also play influential roles, the most important teacher of hatred is the conflict itself. Suicide bombers and those who fire Qassem rockets on the one hand and, on the other, those who steal Palestinian lands and destroy olive trees and, above all, those who support the humiliation of occupation are the true professors of hatred. By all means, change the textbooks, teach anti-racism, and bring Palestinian and Jewish youngsters together to recognize their common humanity, but I fear the changes will be negligible until there are real strides towards peace.

Rodgers and Hammerstein probably had it right in their South Pacific. "You've got to be taught before it's too late, before you are six or seven or eight, to hate all the people your relatives hate, you've got to be carefully taught." Conflict is the great teacher of hate; peace is the best teacher of understanding.

My bat mitzvah trip to Israel

By AMANDA BELZOWSKI

Guest Voice

After going to Jewish day school for nine years, you'd think I would have known a thing or two about Israel.

Well, I was about to learn that you really can't feel Israel through the pages of a textbook. When I found out that I would be going to Israel to celebrate my bat mitzvah this summer, I was overwhelmed and overjoyed, because after all those years of learning about the Jewish homeland, I was now going to experience it all.

I love to help in my community, and I've helped many great causes, including the UJA campaign, as well as the Heart and Stroke Foundation with my annual lemonade stand, so I knew I didn't just want to go to Israel and absorb its richness and beauty for myself. I wanted to give back to it in some way, because so many people gave up so much to create it and so many work so hard to keep this small land safe.

I thought hard about how I was going to help, since I couldn't just run a lemonade stand when I got there. I had heard about twinning projects and decided that I wanted to give someone who lives in Israel the experience of a bat mitzvah with me, since many Israelis don't have the same opportunities as we in Canada do.

After a recent trip to Africa, I felt a special bond and connection with its people, so I decided to contact someone from the Ethiopian Jewish community to find out if I could twin with a girl becoming bat mitzvah. They suggested a girl named Rivka, and I wrote her a letter in Hebrew. I was thrilled when she replied. I had a pen pal in Israel.

The experience made me think about all the kids who died in the Holocaust and never got the chance to be pen pals and, more importantly, the chance to have a bar or bat mitzvah. How could I give someone the experience of a bat mitzvah without them being there? I decided to contact Yad Vashem, the Israeli Holocaust Memorial Museum, for help. I wanted to find someone who lived in Israel that was related to someone who died in the Holocaust. Yad Vashem gave me some names of organizations that might be able to help, and after many months, I found a young university student named Reut who had family who died in the Holocaust.

We arranged to meet at Yad Vashem. She told me about her family, and I asked her if I could honour the memory of her cousin, Luba, who died before her bat mitzvah. Reut was so touched that you could hear the tears in the words of her e-mail, so I knew our meeting at Yad Vashem would be special.

I felt confident that by giving others a smile and something special that I was going to have the best, most meaningful bat mitzvah ever!

I stepped off the plane and immediately knew I was home. Rivka and her family had invited my family to visit them at their home in Lod. I knew that this would be a great opportunity to meet my Ethiopian twin and her family and see what her home life is like. I couldn't believe that their whole apartment was the size of a typical Canadian kitchen, and she lived there with four siblings and her parents. Rivka's father welcomed us with great warmth and hospitality, and her mother cooked us some delicious Ethiopian traditional food.

Afterward, I told Rivka and her family what Canada was like. I did it in Hebrew. It was hard, but they understood – pictures helped. I can't even describe how I felt when Rivka and I found a card game that we both knew. I felt as if we had been friends for years. Rivka's family was so kind and not so different than mine, and I was happy to be giving her an opportunity of a lifetime in return. We had arranged for her and her older sister to come stay at our hotel at the Dead Sea and then to come to Masada with me to my bat mitzvah ceremony. She would get to go into the Dead Sea, experience Masada and visit Ein Gedi together with me, both of us for the first time.

We later met with Reut at Yad Vashem. She had taken a 2-1/2 hour bus ride to see us. Yad Vashem was a life-changing experience. Inside, it's very meaningful, but kind of scary, because you see many artifacts actually from the Holocaust, and you see horrible pictures of how the Jews had to survive under the terrible conditions of the ghettos and concentration camps. Reut gave us a personalized tour, which was special because I got to hear it from someone who has carried around that pain in her heart every day of her life. After visiting the Children's Memorial Museum at Yad Vashem, our tour guide let me introduce Reut to the group. Reut talked about Luba and her family, and about how she was so touched that I was going to honour Luba at my bat mitzvah. She gave me a twinning certificate linking me forever to Luba and Reut's entire family.

I knew then that I was ready to be a bat mitzvah and to sing my portion proudly on top of Masada. The ruins there were actually part of a fortress built by King Herod, but some Jews, after being forced to leave Judea by the Romans, fled to the uninhabited mountain retreat. For four years, they held off the Romans who tried to reconquer and destroy the fortress, until finally the Romans decided to use Jewish slaves to build a ramp. Not wanting to be taken by their enemy and not wanting to harm another Jew, they decided to commit suicide. Knowing how important it is for Jews to stick together and support each other wherever we are in the world, I was honoured to be able to enter adulthood at such a meaningful place in Jewish history.

We woke up at 3:30 a.m. and got ready for the special day. I was going to have my bat mitzvah ceremony with the other four kids on my tour bus. We started before sunrise with a Shacharit service, and then did the Torah readings. I was very nervous, but I knew that with Rivka watching me and Luba, the girl who perished in the Holocaust, watching over me, I would do great. Rivka wasn't comfortable standing beside me, because in her family, girls never approach the Torah, so she sat close to the front, smiling as I sang my portion loud and clear.

The sun began to rise over Masada as I finished my portion, and a very warm feeling came over me. I felt that something had changed, like I was more responsible, and I was right, because when a Jewish boy or girl becomes a bar or bat mitzvah, they become responsible for their actions. It was an incredible feeling.

Rivka then toured Masada and Ein Gedi with us before she had to leave. We promised to stay in touch after sharing such a special time together.

Touring Israel was an experience of a lifetime. It's the place where Judaism has lived and thrived for thousands of years, and the place where you can learn more about Jewish history and culture than anywhere else in the world. I got to try new things and see sights I never knew existed, including amazing 2,000-year-old walls, buildings and even cities! I got to stand next to the Stone of Foundation, at a spot along the Kotel, and touching it with both my hands was so wonderful that I burst into tears of joy as soon as I felt it. I don't even know why. I just knew that I was in my homeland.

My trip to Israel made me realize that tikkun olam (repairing the world) is more important now than ever. My parents have always taught my brother and I to be there for our family, and I have always given back to my community through volunteering and charity work. I now know that family extends far beyond the city you live in and that we in the Jewish community are all connected and are all family. We need to be there for each other and help and give back whenever we can.

With my twinning projects, I not only gave something to a special family in Israel and honoured the memory of someone who never made it to Israel, but I grew so much in the process as a young Jewish woman. I hope everyone gets the opportunity to visit Israel like I did and will plan to make it more meaningful by giving back to our people. It feels great, and I promise that it will be a trip that you will never forget. But even if you can't get there, you can always help in some way, because every little bit counts to make our world a better place.

Amanda Belzowski lives in Toronto.

Blintzes ideal to break the fast

Sweet or savoury, depending on your taste

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

When it comes time to prepare a meal to break the fast, nothing works better than a blintz casserole. Some blintzes are savoury, suitable for accompanying a main course, such as potatoes with onions. Yet, in my opinion, the best blintzes are sweet, particularly those with fruit or cheese fillings.

The following recipe have all graced my break the fast table at one time or another. Some are faster than others to make, but all are delicious.

CLASSIC BLINTZ BATTER

Submitted by Margie Feldmen-Miller Oakbrook, Ill.

3 eggs
1 cup flour
1/4 sugar
3/4 cup milk
1/4 water

In a bowl, combine the eggs, add flour and sugar and beat to combine. Mix in the milk and water a little bit at a time until you get a batter. Heat up a frying pan on medium-high heat, spray with non-stick spray, pour in just enough batter to coat the pan, wait until it starts to bubble and the bottom is slightly brown, flip, let it sit for another 30 seconds or so on the other side, slide onto a plate. Makes 4 to 6. This recipe can be doubled or tripled

CHEESE OR POTATO BLINTZES

2 eggs, well beaten
1 cup flour
1/2 tsp. salt
1 cup milk or non dairy substitute
1 tbsp. sugar (omit for potato blintzes)

Cheese Filling
3/4 pound pot or farmer's cheese
1 large egg lightly beaten
salt and pepper to taste OR for a sweet blintz, use 2 tsp. sugar
1/2 tsp. cinnamon (optional)

Potato Filling
4 potatoes peeled and cooked
2 onions chopped and sautéed
1 large egg lightly beaten
salt and pepper to taste

Make batter by adding salt, sugar and milk to eggs stirring well to blend; gradually add flour (Tip: replace 1/3 of the flour with potato starch for a very smooth batter), stirring until smooth. Heat a 6-in. to 7-in. skillet, over moderately high heat, greased lightly. Pour in sufficient batter to thinly coat the bottom of the pan (1 to 2 tablespoons), quickly rotate the pan to distribute batter evenly, pour excess batter back into bowl. Cook until the batter sets and the edge of the pancake starts to leave the sides of the pan. Turn out onto a clean cloth and repeat until all batter is used, greasing pan when needed. Regulate the heat and frying time so that each pancake will cook to a uniform pale gold colour.

Fill the blintzes: place a tablespoon of filling in the centre of the cooked side of the pancake and fold over to make a square pocket, or place filling at one end of the blintz leaf and roll up encasing the filling. Fry the blintzes on all sides until golden. Serve with sour cream and or fruit sauces.

Cheese filling: in the work bowl of a food processor, combine all ingredients and process until smooth.

Potato filling: in the work bowl of a food processor, combine all ingredients until smooth, adjust seasonings.

Makes 8 to 10. This recipe can be doubled or tripled.

PUFF PASTRY BLINTZ LOAF

3 8-oz. packages cream cheese or any combination of cheese to 24 oz.
2 large packages crescent rolls or 2 sheets of puff pastry cut to fit the pan
1 cup plus 2 tbsp. sugar
2 egg yolks or 1 egg
1-1/2 tsp. vanilla

Preheat oven to 350. Butter a 9 x 13-in. pan and press out 1 layer of rolls. In a bowl, combine the sugar, cream cheese, yolks and vanilla. Spread the mixture over the first layer of rolls. Cover the cheese mixture with the 2nd layer of rolls. Bake for about 30 minutes. Refrigerate leftovers. Serves 8 to 10.

BLINTZ SOUFFLE

This version of blintzes uses more eggs than the classic one, giving this dish its firmness.

Batter
1/2 tsp. salt
1-1/2 cups flour
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 cup water
1 cup orange juice
6 eggs

Filling
2 lb. cottage cheese
2 egg yolks
2 tbsp. sugar
pinch of salt
1 tbsp. vanilla
1 tbsp. flour, optional

For the pan
butter
powdered Sugar (optional)
ground cinnamon (optional)

Preheat the oven to 375. Add the ingredients for the batter to a food processor or blender. Process until the batter is smooth and thin.

Thoroughly mix the ingredients for the filling. Add the flour if the mixture seems too soft.

Generously butter a 9 x 13-in. pan. Pour in half the batter. Layer the cottage cheese mixture on top and smooth. Cover with the remaining batter. Bake 50 to 60 minutes, until the top is puffed and uniformly golden but not brown. Sprinkle with powdered sugar and/or cinnamon, if desired. Serve with sour cream and cut-up fresh fruit such as strawberries or bananas. Serves 12-14.

Elaine Radis is said to have created this variation of the recipe.

EASY CHEESE BLINTZ SOUFFLE

Batter
2 sticks melted butter
1/2 cup sugar
2 eggs, beaten
1 cup flour
3 tsp. baking powder
1/2 cup milk
pinch of salt
1 tsp. vanilla

Filling
1 lb. cream cheese
1 lb. cottage cheese
2 beaten eggs
1/2 to 1 cup sugar
pinch of salt
juice of 1 lemon

Preheat oven to 300. Mix batter in 1 bowl. Mix filling in another bowl. Pour 1/2 batter in a 9 x 13-in. casserole dish. Pour filling over batter. Pour remaining batter over filling. Bake 45 minutes in preheated oven. Serves 8

From www.cooks.com.

PINEAPPLE BLINTZ SOUFFLE

1 stick butter
1 dozen frozen blintzes, 6 cheese and 6 fruit, or all cheese
1 1/2 cups sour cream
1/4 cup crushed pineapple, well drained
pinch of salt
1 tsp. vanilla
1/4 cup orange juice
4 eggs
1/2 cup sugar
ground cinnamon

Defrost blintzes. Preheat oven to 350. Place stick of butter in a 9 x 13 x 2-in. pan. Place pan in oven while it is preheating, and remove as soon as butter is melted.

Swish butter in pan, so it covers bottom and sides. Lay out blintzes in pan, alternating cheese and fruit so that in any direction, a cheese blintz will be adjacent to a fruit blintz. (This will insure that guests will be served a combination of the flavours.)

In a large bowl, mix together sour cream, pineapple, salt, vanilla and orange juice.

In another bowl, beat eggs. Add sugar to eggs, and continue to beat until they are well combined. Mix egg mixture into sour cream mixture and beat until they are mixed well. Pour mixture over blintzes in pan, making sure all blintzes are covered. Sprinkle cinnamon over all. Bake for approximately 45 minutes, until souffle is puffy, and lightly browned. Serve warm. This freezes well. Serves 6 to 8.

A hearty soup or stew is ideal in the sukkah

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

Sukkot, the Festival of Booths, starts this year on Oct. 2. It's "late" this year, and the weather may turn predictably fall-like (if not quite wintery) in many parts of Canada.

Serving meals in the sukkah is often a challenge. By the time the family cook has cooked all the way from Rosh Hashanah through the first couple of days of Sukkot, the task of providing the rest of the week's menus may be daunting. Some hearty, hot, main-course soups or stews are certainly in order.

Try goulash soup: my Viennese mother-in-law of blessed memory made the best goulash around. Alas, we never recorded her recipe before she passed away, but my husband claims that the one below is a close clone. It's a big recipe, serving 8-10 hearty eaters who will enjoy it over noodles or with dumplings or spaetzle and then mop up the sauce with good bread. My mother-in-law always stressed that one should have the same volume of meat and onions, so adjust your onions accordingly.

VIENNESE BEEF GOULASH

8-10 onions, peeled, coarsely chopped
5 lb. beef flanken, cut into 1-inch cubes
2 bay leaves
2 tbsp. dried marjoram
8 tbsp. sweet paprika
1 tbsp. finely ground caraway seeds
8 garlic cloves, finely chopped
salt and pepper
1-1/2 quarts or more water

Heat oil in a large, heavy saucepan. Add onions and sauté over medium-high heat, stirring occasionally until golden. Add meat, bay leaves, marjoram, paprika, caraway seeds, garlic, salt and pepper. Sauté for about five minutes.

Add water to cover and simmer, covered, for about 3 hours or until meat is tender. Add water as needed; partially uncover pot as needed. Remove bay leaves before serving.

INDIAN MULLIGATAWNY SOUP

Thick and hearty, this unusual soup is tasty any time, but perhaps even more so when the family has had enough "regular" chicken soup.

3 tbsp. oil
1 large onion, chopped
2 tbsp. all-purpose flour, sifted
2 quarts chicken stock
3 tbsp. uncooked long-grain rice, checked
8 oz. cooked chicken, diced
2 medium, ripe tomatoes, peeled, roughly chopped
2 stalks celery, thinly sliced
1 medium tart apple, peeled, diced
3 carrots, trimmed, diced
1 medium green or red bell pepper, diced
1-1/4 tsp. mild curry powder
1/8 tsp. black pepper
salt to taste
diced Anaheim pepper (optional)

Heat oil in large stockpot over medium heat. Cook onion, stirring, about 2 minutes. Stir in flour, then gradually stir in stock. Heat to boiling. Stir in rice. Reduce heat to low. Cover and cook for 20 minutes, stirring occasionally.

Add remaining ingredients. Cover and continue to cook for about 20 minutes or until carrots are done. Correct seasoning.

Ladle into soup bowls, evenly distributing solids and liquids. Garnish with finely diced Anaheim pepper, if desired. Makes 8-10 servings.

YELLOW LENTIL STEW

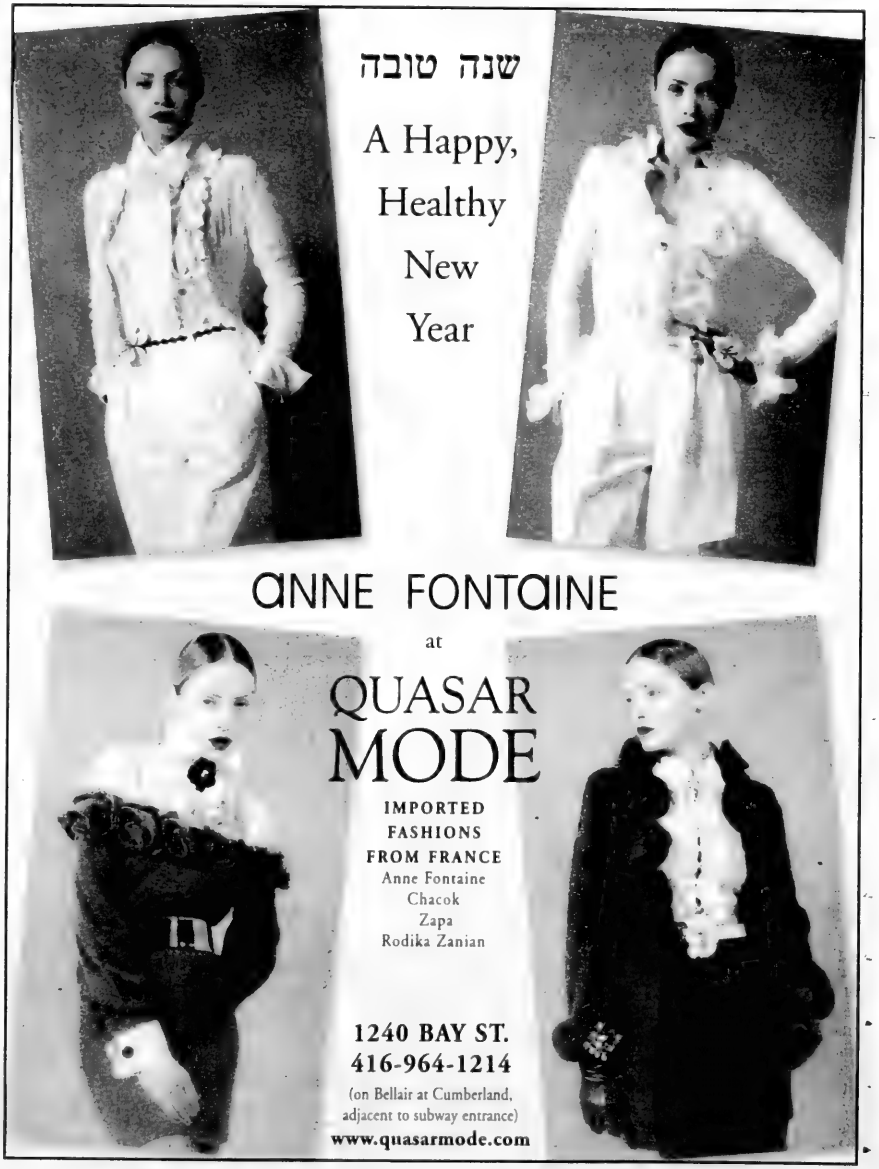
This is vegetarian. If you would like a meat alternative, add tiny beef or chicken meatballs toward the end of the cooking time. Serve over rice or couscous.

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, chopped
2 cloves garlic, chopped
1 red bell pepper, seeded, coarsely chopped
1 green bell pepper, seeded, coarsely chopped
2 medium carrots, peeled and chopped
1 medium eggplant, peeled and chopped
1 medium zucchini, peeled and chopped
1 tsp. cayenne powder
1 tbsp. ground cumin
1 tbsp. dried oregano
2 cups dried yellow lentils, sorted, rinsed in a strainer
1 2 cup semi-dry red wine (optional)
1 20-oz. can crushed tomatoes
5 medium ripe tomatoes, peeled and chopped
1 20-oz. can garbanzo beans, drained
salt and pepper

Heat oil in a large pot over medium-high heat. Stir in onions and garlic and cook until soft (watch garlic carefully). Add peppers and carrots and continue to cook for another 2 minutes. Add eggplant, zucchini, seasonings and lentils, stirring to coat. Add wine and tomatoes.

Bring to a boil and then reduce heat to simmer. Cover and cook for 1-2 hours or until lentils are soft. Check occasionally to see if more liquid is needed. – if so, add 1-2 cups of water.

Stir in chick peas when lentils are soft. Continue to cook for about 15 minutes. Add salt and pepper to taste. Makes 10-12 servings and some to freeze.



Montreal seniors home fetes its 13 centenarians

One gentleman in the group which ranges in age from 100 to 106

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — If you added up all the years lived by the birthday celebrants at this party, and went back in history that far, western Europe would just be entering the Dark Ages.

Thirteen residents of the Jewish Eldercare Centre, aged from 100 to 106 – more than 1,300 years among them – were feted recently at a joint celebration. It's the largest number of centenarians living at the 320-bed long-term care institution at any one time that anyone can remember, said executive director Barbra Gold.

The 13, 12 of them women, are: Bella Huss, 106; Halina Aichenbaum, 103; Erzsebet Elfer and Rasela Veinberg, 102; Gertrude Brunoff, 101; and Margit Brody, Winnefred Candlish, Lillian Dingott, Ann Elias, Rifka Herscovici, Bryna Goffman, Ann Nutik and, the sole man, Joseph Gruber, all 100.

Their backgrounds are varied. At least three were born in Montreal, and the rest in Europe. Most of them raised families, and some worked outside the home.

Goffman is a bit of a local celebrity, having managed the family business, Mrs. Whyte's Pickles, for many years. Nutik, one of the Montreal natives, was a social worker, accomplished pianist, and wife of a pediatrician, while Elias was a legal secretary, who travelled extensively and married later in life.

Huss, the doyenne of the group, was born in Austria, had two sons, and owned a store with her husband. Staff say she is still meticulous about her appearance.

World War II upset the lives of others. Aichenbaum was born into a wealthy, prominent family, the Rosenboims, in Poland. She was a lawyer before the war.

She and her late husband, Simon, were sent to forced labour camps in Siberia, and at war's end, she led more than 200 orphans to safety in Afghanistan.

The couple, who had no children of their own, lost many relatives in the Holocaust, all their material worth, and started all over after immigrating to Montreal in 1948.

Aichenbaum is a lifelong Zionist, visited Israel – she will tell you – 26 times, and continues to follow the news about the country. She has nephews and nieces living in Israel, and eagerly awaits their phone calls.

Widowed in 1997, she was living on her own at the King David Residence until a fall three years ago. Almost up to that time, she was raising money for Canadian Hadassah-WIZO, selling raffle tickets, said her friend Renna Bassel.

Asked how she feels, the cheerful Aichenbaum replied, "It depends on the day – if it's good weather and good news from Israel, it's a good day," she said.

She will be buried in Israel next to her husband, and happily recites the co-ordinates of her cemetery plot.

The most youthful of the group, most agree, is Herscovici, who was born in Romania in 1908, immigrated to Israel in 1958, and then to Canada in 1970. She speaks Romanian, Yiddish and a little French.

Her only child, architect Erica Mates, said her mother lived independently until four years ago and still goes to Florida in the winter. Her longevity and continuing health can be attributed to "a good daughter and son-in-law," Mates said.

The party was organized by occupational therapist Hélène Sauvageau and Audrey Donzelot, a student from France completing a six-month internship at the centre.

They prepared short profiles of each of the 13 and showed slides of them. Many still enjoy life. Brody, a smoker who will be 101 in December, likes games, television and the radio, and is said to have a sense of humour.

The sole gentleman, Gruber, was born in Czechoslovakia, came to Canada in 1952. He and his wife of 61 years, Hannah, had one daughter and both worked in a curtain factory.

The couple shares the same room, and Sauvageau said, "Mr. Gruber cannot bear to be separated from his wife. The bond is so strong that he never makes a decision without consulting her."

Each of the 13 were given a gift-packaged set of personalized letters of congratulation from Queen Elizabeth II, Gov. Gen. Michaëlle Jean, Prime Minister Stephen Harper and Mount Royal MP Irwin Cotler, whose riding encompasses the centre.

Donzelot and Sauvageau also presented each person with framed versions of the brief bios they prepared, along with a current photo and one taken when they were younger.

"People ask me why I want to take care of the elderly," Donzelot said. "The answer is the three "Ls" – love, live and learn. I give love to them, and they give so much back. I have learned much about life and living from them."

Son of Israel's first astronaut buried next to his father

JERUSALEM — Israel Air Force pilot Capt. Assaf Ramon was laid to rest next to his father, Ilan Ramon, on Monday, a day after he was killed in a training accident while flying an IAF jet.

The funeral at Kibbutz Nahalal was closed to the media, as requested by Ramon's mother, Rona.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, President Shimon Peres, Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Israel Defence Forces (IDF) Chief Gabi Ashkenazi and other dignitaries were in attendance.

Netanyahu postponed a meeting with U.S. President Barack Obama's Mideast envoy, George Mitchell, in order to attend the funeral.

Ramon, 21, died when the F-16A Falcon jet he was flying crashed during a routine training flight near the southern Hebron Hills. His father, Israel's first astronaut, perished with the other six astronauts on board the space shuttle Columbia in 2003. Like his son, Ilan Ramon was an F-16 pilot.

Netanyahu said Monday that the fatal crash that took Assaf Ramon's life was a "double loss," almost on the level of "a biblical tragedy."

"A father and son followed their hearts and soared to the heavens in chariots of steel, crashing to the Earth in chariots of fire," Netanyahu said.

On hearing the news of the death of the young pilot Sunday, Netanyahu said in a statement: "Few are the moments when personal pain pierces the national heart with such force. Today, the whole nation is enveloped in endless sorrow for the death of Assaf, who fell from the heavens like his father, Ilan.

"This is a terrible tragedy for Rona and all the Ramon family, and it is a terrible tragedy for the people of Israel.

"I was excited when Ilan, the youngest pilot who blew up the reactor of death in Iraq, took with himself to space a memento from the death camps in the Holocaust," Netanyahu added.

He was referring to the small pencil drawing titled Moon Landscape, by Peter Ginz, a 14-year-old Jewish boy who was killed at Auschwitz, that Ilan Ramon carried with him into space.

Earlier Sunday, Barak described the pilot's death as heartbreaking.

"This is a painful and sad day," Barak said. "The heart is breaking, we are all with Rona and the siblings. Nonetheless, we will continue to strengthen ourselves, while also extending our hand and continuing in every way to make peace."

Peres spoke of Assaf Ramon's death in similar terms.

"What has befallen us today is more than a tragedy, it is a fracture," Peres said in a statement.

"I knew both of them: Assaf was a fighter [and] the son of a fighter, a dreamer among dreamers. They are a symbol of everything that is good in the Jewish state. They were the most exceptional of the exceptional."

The IAF commander, Maj.-Gen. Ido Nehushtan, informed the family of their loss. They were later visited by former IAF commanders and senior Israel Defence Forces officers, including the chief of staff, Lt.-Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi.

The chief of staff later issued a statement expressing his sorrow. "I received the bitter announcement of Capt. Assaf Ramon's passing with teary eyes, as did the commanders and soldiers of the IDF and the whole of Israel," he said.

"Only three months ago, I stood with excitement, holding Rona on the ceremony grounds, while Assaf received his pilot's wings from Israel's president, Mr. Shimon Peres, as he excelled in the course."

Ashkenazi was referring to the IAF's gruelling training course for pilots. In June, Assaf Ramon received a presidential honour and was given his pilot's wings by Peres.

Netanyahu calls for tougher nuclear sanctions on Iran

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said on Monday the time had come for tougher sanctions against Iran over its nuclear program.

"I believe that now is the time to start harsh sanctions against Iran – if not now then when? These harsh sanctions can be effective," Netanyahu was quoted by a parliamentary official as telling a legislative committee.

"I believe that the international community can act effectively," he said, according to the official, who briefed reporters on Netanyahu's remarks to parliament's foreign affairs and defence committee.

"The Iranian regime is weak, the Iranian people would not rally around the regime if they felt for the first time that there was a danger to their regime – and this would be a new situation," Netanyahu said.

His comments appeared to signal – amid wide speculation that Israel could opt to attack Iranian nuclear facilities – that it had not given up on international diplomacy to curb Tehran's atomic ambitions.

Netanyahu also said on Monday that there will not be a complete freeze on settlement building and that building in Jerusalem will proceed as usual.

"The Palestinians expect a complete halt to building – it is now clear that this will not happen," Netanyahu said, "Jerusalem is not a settlement, and the building [there] will continue as normal."

While speaking to the foreign affairs and defence committee, Netanyahu spoke about progress made in regard to the peace process, as well as the U.S. demand to freeze building beyond Israel's Green Line (Israel's pre-1967 borders).

Netanyahu told the committee that George Mitchell, U.S. special envoy to the Middle East, had requested a complete halt to settlement building.

"We clarified to the U.S. that we would continue building around 2,500 units whose construction had already begun. Two days ago, we authorized 450 additional units. I stated that we would consider reducing the extent of our building," said Netanyahu.

He spoke about balancing the desire to participate in the peace process and negotiations with the need to allow Jewish residents in the West Bank to live normal lives.

"The reduction in building will be for a limited time, and there is not yet an agreement with the U.S. on the period of time," he said.

In his June speech at Bar-Ilan University, he spoke about two central principles, "the recognition of Israel as a Jewish nation and effective demilitarization of a future Palestinian state."

Since Bar-Ilan, these principles have been seeping into international conversations, Netanyahu said, "For example, Benny Morris wrote in the Guardian that settlements are not the big problem. The bigger problem is the demand being placed on the Palestinians to recognize Israel as a Jewish state. This is a basic condition without which it's impossible to solve this conflict. One of the central things I did was put this topic on the table."

Netanyahu complained "at the same time that we are taking steps to get things started, the other side is making their position more extreme."

Meanwhile, Iran and world powers attempting to resolve a dispute over Tehran's nuclear program will start talks in early October, Iran's state-run Press TV reported on Monday.

U.S. Energy Secretary Steven Chu confirmed Monday in Vienna that his country would take part in the talks as well.

"This is an important first step in the discussion and one hopes for the best," Chu told reporters on the sidelines of the International Atomic Energy Agency General Conference.

Iran's ISNA news agency said European Union foreign policy chief Javier Solana and Iranian chief nuclear negotiator Saeed Jalili had agreed to meet on Oct. 1, but that the venue had yet to be decided.

"Javier Solana and Saeed Jalili agreed in a telephone conversation… to meet each other on Oct. 1," ISNA said.

"Both sides have agreed on holding a meeting between representatives of [the six major powers] and representatives of Iran to discuss [Tehran's] proposed package," it said, without making clear if this would be a separate meeting.

Iran last week handed over a package of proposals to the world powers, including the United States, in which Tehran said it was willing to discuss global nuclear disarmament, as well as other international issues in wide-ranging talks.

But the document did not mention Iran's own nuclear program, which the West suspects is aimed at making bombs, and officials have made clear it will not be part of any such discussions.

The Islamic Republic has repeatedly said its nuclear program is for civil energy uses, not weapons.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak on Sunday agreed that Israel, the Palestinians, the Arab world and the international community must all do their part to help advance the Middle East peace process, the Prime Minister's Bureau said in a statement. The two leaders met in Cairo to discuss progress in the region, amid speculation that a deal to free abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Schalit would top their agenda. [Israel Sun photo]

Israel & the Jewish World

For top stars, Israel gig becoming more common

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

TEL AVIV — Madonna managed to sprinkle some of her fairy diva dust on Israel during her recent tour, calling the Jewish state the world's "energy centre," wrapping herself in the flag on stage and even lighting Shabbat candles with Sara Netanyahu.

Audiences, local promoters and officials are hoping her magic will linger and boost an already emerging trend in which Israel is becoming a draw for big-name artists in relatively large numbers.

"Anytime you have a successful concert or artist of that calibre here, people will take notice," said Jeremy Hulsh, a concert promoter who also founded Oleh Records, a company that promotes Israeli artists abroad.

"This year was particularly strong, and next year looks to be strong, too. There are lots of newcomer promoters willing to take risks because they are seeing great potential," he said, noting that Israelis are willing to pay top dollar for tickets and thus help the bottom line. "Israelis are both excited and grateful to see any big names coming to Israel."

September alone is seeing the likes of Madonna, Leonard Cohen, Julio Iglesias, Dinosaur Jr. and Faith No More performing here. Earlier this summer, the Pet Shop Boys played, as did the new pop sensation Lady Gaga.

Madonna played two concerts last week to a total of some 100,000 fans, while Cohen's performance for 47,000 sold out in 17 hours – faster than his shows anywhere else in the world.

As promoters and agents talk among themselves, word seems to be spreading that Israel can be a lucrative and successful new stop for performers. Logistics and facilities are top rate, fans pay as much as $400 for good seats for a big name and, despite an uncertain security situation, artists realize when they arrive that the country belies its image as a war zone.

In an age where Israelis feel particularly besieged by international criticism amid calls for cultural and other boycotts, the celebrity acts and the glamorous star power they emit feel especially welcome.

"Madonna is the best ambassador for the Jewish people," gushed Liav Mizrahi, a 31-year-old art teacher from Tel Aviv who saw her first of two concerts here and was still breathless the next day.

Andy David, a spokesperson for the Foreign Ministry, said he hoped the message that Israel is a "normal" country was a happy by-product of high-profile acts such as Madonna coming to the country.

"We are a normal country where people enjoy music, and performers understand there is a market here for their music, he said, adding later that "it's good business and a good place to come."

"We are not some crazy corner of the world where everything is upside down," David said.

Madonna, in particular, has forged a unique connection with Israel following her involvement with the Kabbalah Center in Los Angeles. Although her last performance here was 16 years ago, she has been to Israel several times in recent years on private visits that included the Western Wall in Jerusalem and the graves of mystics in Safed.

Although the average Israeli seems a bit befuddled by her interest in Jewish mysticism, especially the Kabbalah Center's version – serious Jewish scholars have dismissed it as a flashy and inauthentic New Age perversion – they have embraced her all the same.

Officials also have embraced the celebrity fawning with enthusiasm. Madonna dined with Tzipi Livni, a prime ministerial hopeful and leader of the opposition, at a trendy Tel Aviv restaurant. Last Friday evening the singer met with Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu and his wife, Sara. Madonna, who reportedly knows some Hebrew, recited the blessing over the Sabbath candles with the first lady.

One major paper featured Madonna's arrival on its front page, overshadowing news that former Prime Minister Ehud Olmert had been indicted on corruption charges the day before.

The occasional big-name music act certainly isn't new to Israel. Paul McCartney performed last year, and Roger Waters, the late Michael Jackson and Elton John also made their way here over the years.

What is new, industry insiders say, is the volume of such performances, due in part to Israel's sound track record as a place where fans will pay relatively high prices for tickets.

Performing in Israel involves not only security considerations and the extra insurance necessary to cover them, but the expense of flying in equipment, crew and backup musicians from Europe, as most performers include Israel as part of their larger European tours.

"It's easier now because promoters are not afraid of Israel and the insurance companies are covering the risks of such shows," said Perla Mitrani, a project manager for Israstage.com, a site that features Israeli concert dates. "Israel is now becoming a market like anywhere else, a normal stop on people's tours. The question is how much people are ready to pay for this or that performer."

According to Avisar Savir, a promoter who is arranging an upcoming concert here of the chassidic reggae musician Matisyahu, the world economic crisis also has provided an opportunity for Israel.

"People need to open new markets," he said, "and Israel is seen as a legitimate place to come in a way it wasn't before."

Chavez accuses Israel of genocide against Palestinians

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez accused Israel of genocide against the Palestinian people, telling a French newspaper that the bombing of Gaza late last year was an unprovoked attack.

"The question is not whether the Israelis want to exterminate the Palestinians. They're doing it openly," Chavez said in an interview with Le Figaro published on Sept. 9.

The Venezuelan president, who last week completed a tour of Middle Eastern and Arab countries, brushed aside Israeli assertions that its attack on Gaza was a response to rocket fire from Islamist group Hamas which rules the coastal enclave.

"What was it if not genocide? ... The Israelis were looking for an excuse to exterminate the Palestinians," Chavez said, adding that sanctions should have been slapped on Israel.

Israel launched an offensive against the Gaza Strip on Dec. 27, 2008 with the declared aim of curbing rocket fire from the region into southern Israel.

The land, sea and air assault lasted 22 days, and left some 1,300 Palestinians dead, according to medical sources.

Chavez said he recognized Israel's right to exist, as with all countries, but added that the Jewish state must respect the Palestinian people's right to self-determination.

The Venezuelan president said he wanted more clarity from the United States on its foreign policy, adding that he was disappointed by recent U.S. dealings in South America, including the installation of military bases in Colombia.

"Sadly, the arrival of Obama brought with it a lot of hope, but little change," he said.

In related news, a new investigation has uncovered information showing that Iran is using Venezuelan banks as a means of evading obligatory international sanctions and obtaining materials needed for their nuclear program.

The information was revealed in a speech last week at the Brooking Institute by Robert Morganthau, of the Manhattan District Attorney's office. He claims that investigations by his office show that ties between Venezuela and Iran are strengthening as both countries share nuclear aspirations.

Morganthau pointed out that the president of Venezuela, Hugo Chavez, is interested in building a "nuclear village" with Iran's help and that this development will undercut the stability of Latin America.

There is concern that the United States is not following the strengthening of ties between the two countries closely enough. The United States has placed no economic sanctions on Venezuela and therefore does not closely follow their banking system.

"I have little faith that this is being effectively done, and the Iranians, aware of this vulnerability, appear to be taking advantage of it," Morganthau said in regards to the United States ensuring the legitimacy of Venezuelan bank transactions.

The U.S. State Department said in response that it is worried about the spreading of nuclear weapons; however they will respect the right of all countries to decide their own diplomatic relationships with other countries.

According to investigations earlier in the year by United Nations sources in New York it appears that Venezuela and Iran have stepped up mutual co-operation in efforts to establish terror bases and infrastructure across Latin America.

The sources base their assessment on senior Israeli and American officials and say that Iran has substantially boosted its presence in several Latin American states, and increased the number of Iranian representatives in those states' embassies and consulates in a bid to give a diplomatic cover to spy and underground activity.

The Iranian effort, which has been joined by Venezuela in a joint effort to establish a strong terror base in the region, is especially palpable in countries ruled by anti-American left wing regimes such as Cuba, Nicaragua, Ecuador and Bolivia.

Iran has also increased its presence in Mexico and Colombia, which are considered more U.S. friendly. The rate of the increase of Iranian personnel in Mexican and Colombian embassies were described by the New York sources as "astronomical" and as "not proportional with the embassies' local requirements." Some believe that this increase is in fact in preparation for subversive activity.

Israel Briefs

Katyushas strike the north

Israel returned artillery fire last week into Lebanon after three Katyusha rockets hit northwestern Israel. The Katyushas caused no injuries nor property damage. Israeli army artillery returned fire in the direction of the launching of the rockets. Foreign media said the rockets were launched from the area of Tyre. Israel Radio quoted anonymous officials as saying that the Lebanese government would be held responsible for the rocket fire. Tensions have increased in recent weeks between Israel and Lebanon, related in part to Hezbollah's massive rearming after its 2006 war with Israel.

Bar Kochba-era coins found

The largest ever cache of coins from the period of the Bar Kochba revolt was found in a cave in the Judean Hills. The 120 gold, silver and bronze coins, as well as some pottery and weapons, were discovered during a cave research and mapping project by Hebrew University and Bar-Ilan University researchers. The coins were found in a cave with a hidden wing that likely served as a hiding place for the Jewish fighters of the Bar Kochba revolt against the Romans. Most of the coins are in excellent condition and were struck over as rebels' coins on top of Roman coins. The new imprints show Jewish images and words, such as the facade of the Temple in Jerusalem and the slogan "for the freedom of Jerusalem."

West Africa increases ties

Israel signed its first agreement with a federation of 15 West African countries. Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman signed an agreement between Israel and the Economic Community of West African States during an official visit to Nigeria, part of a weeklong African tour. Three of the economic community's member states – Guinea, Mali and Niger – do not have diplomatic relations with Israel. The cooperation agreement is in the fields of education, agriculture, culture and economic relations. The two sides can agree to co-operate in other fields as well. Lieberman and Commission Vice-President Jean de Dieu Somda also signed a pact between the West African organization and the Israel Center for International Co-operation to work together to initiate projects with emphasis on reducing poverty and preserving and protecting the environment.

Netanyahu's secret mission?

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was reported to have flown on a secret mission to Russia for discussions with President Vladimir Putin. One of the main issues that was apparently on Netanyahu's agenda was the S-300 air defence missile deal with Iran. Initial reports on Moscow's intention to deliver the advanced missiles to Iran were published seven years ago. Israel would like to see the deal stopped or at least delayed because the delivery of this system would substantially improve Iran's ability to defend its nuclear installations against an air strike. Reports of the alleged visit have caused a stir in Israel and in Russia.

Tamiflu-resistant H1N1

Israel's Health Ministry identified a strain of swine flu that is resistant to the Tamiflu drug. The strain was identified in a sample taken from a high-risk Israeli swine flu patient who recovered from the virus. Tamiflu-resistant H1N1 virus strains have been found in other areas of the world. Another drug, Relenza, also is used to treat the swine flu.

Hearing-impaired twin sisters join IDF

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — When Jerusalem-born identical twins Dana and Tamar Tal-El, 19, were diagnosed with profound hearing impairment at the age of two, doctors said they would never be able to speak normally.

Doctors also said they would never be able to learn normally and that they would most certainly never serve in the Israel Defence Forces (IDF).

But Dana and Tamar learned to speak almost flawlessly, and the pair went to regular kindergarten, elementary and high schools. The dynamic duo this week again proved the doctors' wrong as they commenced their service with the IDF.

Last Thursday, the girls attended their first day of service, completing the necessary administrative tasks and picking up their uniforms. Dana begins her military service as a photographer for the air force, and Tamar begins her service as a soldier-teacher for children with difficult home lives in one of Israel's development towns. "I'm really excited – I can't wait to start," says Dana.

"Me, too," chimes in Tamar. "It's really exciting!"

When the girls were called by the IDF for their initial assessment in 11th grade, they were both given a "ptor," or "release," due to their hearing impairment. But, like most other challenges with which they have been presented, the girls, both with double cochlear implants, refused to take no for an answer.

"A lot of people in my class said they were envious and that they wanted a ptor to get out of going to the army, too," says Dana, who graduated with a photography speciality from the Jerusalem High School for the Arts. "But for me, it was very hard to be rejected this way. I don't consider myself disabled, and I certainly don't feel that I should be prevented from serving in the army. Everyone goes to the army, and now it's my turn."

Tamar adds: "I have lived in this country, under the protection of its army, for the last 19 years. I want to give something back to Israel from me. I want to feel like I have done something for Israel, something significant. This is very important to me."

And so, after a struggle that lasted several months and entailed many phone calls and visits to IDF offices and doctors, the girls settled on the only option available to them – volunteering. "They [the IDF] didn't make it easy," says the girls' mother, Elaine Matlow Tal-El, who is originally from Toronto.

For her, the girls' dealings with the IDF are reminiscent of her own contact with the state's social institutions charged with caring for the hearing impaired, she said. When the girls were diagnosed as babies, there was an organization that fit them with hearing aids and another to help admit them into special education facilities.

"That is how they prepared us to raise children with hearing loss – they told us that they would be special needs, and need special education, and they would never be like everybody else," says Matlow Tal-El. "I thought, no. We can do better."

She and her Israel-born husband, Eli, along with another couple who made aliyah from Toronto, Jozie and Nathan Eisner (who also have two hearing-impaired children), put their heads together and, in 1995, non-profit organization A.V. Israel was born.

With offices in Ra'anana and Jerusalem, A.V. Israel is dedicated to helping deaf children and their parents by providing audiological testing and diagnostic assessments; state-of-the-art technology, including cochlear implants, digital hearing aids and assistive FM devices; auditory-verbal (A.V.) education and speech therapy, as well as counselling and professional training, with the ultimate goal of teaching deaf children to "listen" and speak, so that they could integrate into mainstream schools and the culture of the hearing world.

While the current standard for teaching language and speech to the hearing impaired relies on vision – lip reading and sign language – A.V. therapy advocates teaching these skills the natural way, auditorily.

In most cases of hearing impairment, the auditory nerve is still intact, and although it doesn't function on its own, it is possible to stimulate this nerve with electronic impulses, such as those produced by a cochlear implant or other advanced hearing device. Although the sound that is produced by this stimulation is not identical to that produced in a normally functioning auditory system, it is a sound that the brain can translate into meaningful speech and language.

The benefits of this approach are manifold: first, the normal physiological stimulation of the brain enables subjects to learn speech and language naturally, through listening, the way hearing people do; secondly, it is not necessary for individuals with a cochlear implant to see other people when they speak; and thirdly, the sound of the speech of the hearing impaired is much more proximate to normal speech. So much so that Dana says sometimes when she speaks, people sometimes ask her if she has a foreign accent, rather than a hearing impairment.

"Sometimes, I tell them it's because my mom is from Canada," she says with a smile.

"This technology and therapeutic approach is the miracle of the 20th century. It essentially eradicates deafness," says Matlow Tal-El. "There is no reason why a child with hearing loss today can't function in normal society."

Today, A.V. Israel serves more than 200 families across Israel, providing therapy to some 50 children. The centre is also involved in a cochlear implant mapping (fine-tuning) project at Hadassah Medical Center in Jerusalem and in opening a cochlear implant department at Jerusalem's Shaare Zedek Medical Center. "When we decided to bring this approach to Israel, it was like reinventing the wheel. There were no professionals here, and no infrastructure," says Matlow Tal-El.

The progress of the field in Israel can be mapped by her own daughters, the centre's first "graduates." Dana and Tamar had to go to New York for their first cochlear implants at age three, and by the time they were ready for their second implants, at age 14, they were able to have the surgery in Israel.

"This is a major achievement," says Matlow Tal-El. "We are very happy to be able to offer the opportunity to hear, to other children in Israel."

As for her girls, she says, "I couldn't be prouder of them and the progress they have made. Especially this week, with them going off to serve in the army… I am just beside myself."

Noa's followers drown out Barcelona protesters

JTA

BARCELONA — A small cluster of protesters failed to disrupt an Israeli singer at a concert in Barcelona.

Noa, also known as Achinoam Nini, performed a Catalan hymn on Friday at Catalan Day celebrations, backed by the Arab Orchestra of Barcelona.

The reception for the singer was enthusiastic, overwhelming a small group of about 50 anti-Israel activists who stood up and began blowing whistles, waving Palestinian scarves and flags, as well as signs saying "Boycott Israel."

A number of small left-wing parties and groups had called for her removal from the program unless she retracted her statement during last winter's Gaza war against Hamas. In an open letter to the Palestinian people last January, Noa said: "I can only wish for you that Israel will do the job we all know needs to be done, and finally rid you of this cancer, this virus, this monster called fanaticism, today, called Hamas."

Catalan politicians had defended Noa, who has a large following in Europe and particularly in Spain. Josep-Lluis Carod-Rovera, the vice-president of the Catalan parliament, likened those calling for the boycott to Iranian anti-Semites.

Noa promotes Jewish-Arab dialogue; she represented Israel together with an Israeli Arab singer in this year's Eurovision song contest.

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Evan Malach belts out tunes for the revolution

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The way Evan Malach sees it, there's probably no better way to motivate folks to do good than by putting on a concert and letting the musical vibes emitted by its socially conscious performers inspire and infect the crowd.

That's why this Sunday, he's put together a post-Rosh Hashanah gig called Lox, Rock, & Two Smoking Bagels at Toronto's El Mocambo venue (454 Spadina Ave. Doors open 7 p.m.) to help raise funds for Darfur and other causes dear to him; and also as a nod to ushering in the Jewish new year with an act of tikkun olam.

The show will feature performances by singer-songwriters Stacey Kaniuk and Dave Borins; Malach's self-described "chillrock" band, Ev O'Lution; pop-rock outfit The Little Black Dress and LOGIQ, a DJ who will start spinning at midnight to keep the party going long after the bands have put their instruments back in their cases.

Audience members will also be treated to free bagels courtesy of Bagel World and be able to participate in an auction for prizes including Toronto Blue Jays' baseball tickets and furniture from Umbra.

The El Mocambo has waived its rental charges for the venue for the charity event.

Malach, 24 – a Toronto musician, playwright, actor, entrepreneur and social activist – figures the El Mocambo holds approximately 400 guests, and hopes to get the maximum attendance so that the $10 cover charge translates into $4,000 for the charities.

Simply by attending the concert you'll be "making a huge difference in the lives of those at need," Malach said.

Last year he recorded an EP titled Revolution Rising, composed of original material, proceeds of which went to help people in Darfur, Tibet and Burma.

The CD release was part of his Revolution Rising Campaign, designed to draw attention to the atrocities being committed in those regions.

He said Sunday's concert is an extension of that campaign and will be a "live exploration" of the disc.

On the first day of the Beijing 2008 Summer Olympics, Malach launched his grassroots campaign using what he called the "powerful vehicle of the protest song."

At the time, he constructed sites on Facebook and MySpace to promote the campaign and hoped to have around 500,000 fans and supporters by now.

Though the Internet support didn't materialize as much as he'd hoped, word-of-mouth and awareness of his campaign spread south of the border, where San Francisco-based, online charity Kiva.org – an organization that helps facilitate "micro-lending" from donors to "unique entrepreneurs around the globe" – picked up on his cause and has become one of Revolution Rising's two main recipients.

Malach's other charity of choice is SaveDarfur.org.

"Kiva.org were really supportive with providing [information] material," he said, explaining that concert-goers will get to learn a lot about the organization and its outreach.

"As an artist, it's easy to partner up with these established organizations. It's a side project for me... but at the heart of it all, I'm a writer and a musician," he said, adding that it's best to let the charities "do what they do best."

Evan Malach

Over the past year, he's spent time studying acting at the Neighborhood Playhouse School of Theater in New York, appearing in plays and writing new songs, which he hopes to parlay into a new album before year's end. But his social causes have never been far from his heart.

Now back in Toronto, Malach has taken a song-writing course at Ryerson University and "been adjusting [and] playing shows" while he gets ready for Act II of his Revolution Rising Campaign, which takes place this weekend.

"As a grandchild of [Holocaust] survivors and a CHAT graduate, [tikkun olam] is one of my main focuses," he told Heebonics last week.

That, and taming some of his lyrics to sound less holier-than-thou.

Malach said that while much of the feedback he received from Revolution Rising was positive, some of his instructors cautioned him to tone down his tendency to preach.

For instance, on the title track to the album Malach sings: "So what will you do for the poor/ Being raped and ravaged in Darfur?/ Will you take action or sit secure... There's a revolution rising."

That's the 2008 version. He's since decided to change the lyrics when performing the song live, switching the onus from the listener to himself by substituting the word "you" for "I."

"No one wants to be accused. But if you make it personal, everyone wants to peek in and see what other people are experiencing. There are still ways to celebrate life without forgetting those who are suffering," Malach said. "You want to have your message delivered in the most effective way possible."

Which is what he believes will happen at the weekend concert.

The Revolution Rising concert "is about educating people about what Kiva.org and SaveDarfur.org can do," he said.

"If I can even get 10 people to log into the Kiva.org website, or even have more awareness [about injustice in Darfur]... especially at this time of year, Rosh Hashanah, so we don't forget about those who don't have the means to celebrate, I think that's really fitting."

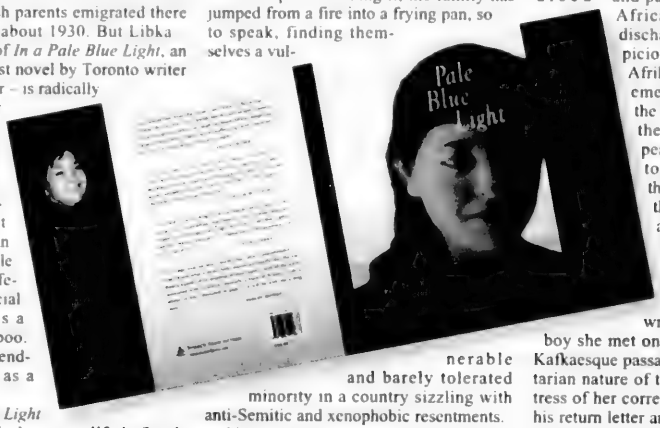
South African apartheid society from a Jewish vantage point

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Libka Hoffman was born in Cape Town, South Africa, soon after her Jewish parents emigrated there from Lithuania about 1930. But Libka the protagonist of In a Pale Blue Light, an extraordinary first novel by Toronto writer Lily Poritz Miller – is radically at odds with her homeland.

As she enters her teenage years in the 1940s, Libka realizes she cannot live in a country in which black people are treated as inferiors and interracial fraternization is a strong social taboo. Her innocent friendships mark her as a social outcast.

In a Pale Blue Light opens a rare window onto life in South Africa's apartheid society from a Jewish vantage point. Although the country offers the Hoffmans a safe haven from the Nazis and a chance to thrive in business, it is still a poisonous and dangerous place.



As the Hoffmans anxiously await letters from their relatives who didn't get out of Europe in time, some Afrikaaners threaten them and break their windows with stones. Without quite realizing it, the family has jumped from a fire into a frying pan, so to speak, finding themselves a vulnerable and barely tolerated minority in a country sizzling with anti-Semitic and xenophobic resentments.

Plunged into mourning by the death of her father, Libka is ridiculed by her schoolmates for performing tasks like scrubbing floors, considered menial for whites, and for her attachment to the family's beloved black servant, Maputo. Daily cloistering herself into a lavatory cubicle over the school lunch hour only adds to her reputation as a weird loner whose values bear close scrutiny.

A series of dark twists reveals the prejudiced and paranoid flavour of South African society. The family discharges Maputo under suspicion of theft and takes in an Afrikaan boarder who, it soon emerges, hates Jews. When the boarder becomes violent, the wronged Maputo reappears like a guardian angel to protect the family. But the boarder easily convinces the police to arrest Maputo and he is imprisoned, possibly for life.

Unwilling to accept the racial status quo, the defiant Libka later writes a letter to a Malayan boy she met on a beach. In a chillingly Kafkaesque passage that reveals the totalitarian nature of the regime, the headmistress of her correctional school intercepts his return letter and summons Libka to the office "on a most unsavoury matter." An inquisition ensues in which the young girl is accused of attempting to subvert the country's basic values.

Sara Hoffman, Libka's mother, is a struggling immigrant with poor language skills and an equally poor understanding of what is happening around her; she is easily led and a willing victim for events about to occur. Blinkered in a different way, Libka's brother, Beryl, wants only to fit in with his country-club friends and impress his girlfriend. He blames Libka for bringing shame to the family.

Although a haunting and ominous feeling dominates the prose, there are also occasional glimmers of light and sweetness. At moments In a Pale Blue Light seems reminiscent of To Kill a Mockingbird, whose wronged and martyred Tom Robinson character shares qualities with Maputo. The themes of prejudice, cruelty and injustice also bring to mind novels such as Disgrace and Cry the Beloved Country. Stephen King fans may also discern a slight affinity with Carrie, another female coming-of-age tale that features an overwhelming sense of ridicule and ostracism.

In a Pale Blue Light joins a long and respectable list of Canadian novels set in distant lands with little or no reference to Canada. Poritz Miller was born in Cape Town to Lithuanian parents, and came to the United States with her family when she was 15. She subsequently worked as an editor in the top echelons of the literary publishing business in New York and then Toronto.

In a Pale Blue Light illuminates the Jewish experience in South Africa from the inside. Its language is original and its voice authentic and devoid of gimmickry. It is a mature and significant work that is bound to garner much attention and possibly literary awards as well. The book is forthcoming from the Sumach Press (sumachpress.com) in October.

In Valentine's Fall by Cary Fagan, Huddie Rosen leaves North York after high school, acquires a wife and kids and an alternate existence as a bluegrass musician in Prague, then revisits his former haunts in Toronto as his marriage and alternate world seem on the verge of collapse.

But there's much more to Valentine's Fall, the latest novel by Toronto author Cary Fagan, a fine literary craftsman whose works have included Felix Roth, The Animals' Waltz, Sleeping Weather, The Doctor's House and a growing list of children's books.

At its centre is an old high-school comrade, Valentine Schwartz, literally a knight in shining armour who cannot accept that his high-school sweetheart has spurned him for another, and does himself in.

A symbol of pure romantic love, Valentine's tragedy occurs during their high-school years but, coincidentally, he is being memorialized years later while Huddie happens to be back in town. Staying with his mother, Huddie reconnects with a stream of characters from his past as he considers whether to start fresh in Toronto.

Besides the surprising resurrection of a character thought dead, Valentine's Fall features the emergence of a sort of authorial alter ego, a writer named Felix Roth whose novel features an X-rated plot involving a human and giant rodent. Roth's presence adds an intriguing level of satire to the novel, as well as a dimensionality that reminds me of opposing mirrors in a barbershop, reflecting back on each other to infinity.

Set in sterile North York, Valentine's Fall is seemingly an allegory with a set of well-drawn contemporary characters. At its heart is the central question of how a person may go on living after his dreams have been shattered. The publisher is Cormorant Books of Toronto.

Jaffa is a strong family drama about doomed romance

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Part of the Toronto International Film Festival's City to City program showcasing Tel Aviv on its 100th birthday, Keren Yedaya's Jaffa is a strong family drama infused with tragedy.

Scheduled to be screened on Sept. 17 at 12:15 p.m. at the Varsity Cinemas, this 105-minute movie grapples deftly with a socially sensitive topic: Arab-Jewish relations in Israel, as seen through the prism of a doomed romance.

Given the fact that 20 per cent of Israel's population consists of Muslim and Christian Arabs, as well as Druze, it's a subject that can't be swept under the rug.

The film, starring a stellar cast of known and unknown actors, is set in Jaffa, a mixed Arab-Jewish neighbourhood in southern Tel Aviv.

It unfolds, initially at least, in a garage owned by Reuven Wolf (Moni Moshonov), an even-tempered man whose lazy son and dutiful daughter, Meir (Roy Assaf) and Mali (Dana Ivgy), work for him as a mechanic and receptionist, respectively.

Reuven also employs two Israeli Arabs, a father and son named Hassan (Hussein Yassin Mahajne) and Tawfik (Mahmud Shalaby).

They all get along, but Meir, a surly good-for-nothing who manages to antagonize just about everyone, is the glaring exception to the rule.

Even his long-suffering mother, Osnat (Ronit Elkabetz), has grown weary and wary of Meir's outbursts and inappropriate behaviour. At one point, in exasperation, she orders him out of the house.

Meir saves the brunt of his aggression for Tawfik, a quietly efficient mechanic of similar age. Things come to a head when Tawfik defies Meir and leaves the garage for an hour to do an errand.

What Meir and his parents do not yet know is that Tawfik and Mali, childhood sweethearts, are in love and planning to elope.

Yedaya establishes the edgy mood of the film in these early scenes and describes their secret relationship in a few revealing broad brushstrokes.

When the lovers meet at night, with the lights of Tel Aviv twinkling in the background, they embrace. But Mali, realizing that she has ventured into uncharted waters, wonders out loud whether they are making a mistake. In response, Tawfik kisses Mali tenderly, sweeping away her doubts.

Life, however, is not so simple, as Yedaya suggests.

Meir's anger explodes in fisticuffs in a brawl with Tawfik, and the violence begets unintended and painful consequences for both families.

Mali, meanwhile, learns that she is pregnant with Tawfik's child, a development that adds another layer of complexity to an already murky story.

Ronit Elkabetz and Moni Moshonov star in the Israeli movie Jaffa playing at the TIFF.

Jaffa succeeds in delineating the underlying tensions and social distance between Jews and Arabs in Israel.

Israeli Arabs, though they speak Hebrew perfectly enough, are portrayed as a distinct, self-contained and culturally different minority.

Within this framework, Tawfik and Mali tread carefully, while common prejudices and fears among Jews about Arabs bubble to the surface.

Drawing a clear-eyed picture of reality in modern-day Israel, Yedaya doesn't hold anything back.

What lifts Jaffa above the threshold of a run-of-the-mill film is its superior script and its better-than-average performances.

The storytelling is generally crisp, though there are lapses midway through, and the actors, particularly Ivgy, Assaf and Moshonov, rise to the occasion.

In short, Jaffa is a movie of which Israel's film industry can be proud.

Uri Zohar portrays a womanizer in Big Eyes

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Uri Zohar was one of the biggest figures in Israeli cinema in the 1960s and 1970s. A comedian as well as a filmmaker, he was a star in Israel's galaxy.

Having subsequently turned to religion, he retreated from the entertainment industry, rarely to be seen again by a mass audience.

Big Eyes - which was screened at the Toronto International Film Festival's City to City program focusing on Tel Aviv – was released in 1974, at the height of Zohar's fame.

Shot in black and white and set in Tel Aviv, Big Eyes is a portrait of a womanizer gone wild and on the brink of self-destruction.

Zohar, who directed the film, plays Benny Furman, a basketball coach who juggles a wife and two mistresses.

The opening scene, in which Furman drives to a rendezvous with one of his lovers, sets the mood.

Uri Zohar at the height of his fame.

Furman has a roving eye, casting sidelong glances at women. As the film's accompanying ballad suggests, he has everything: a good job, a fine wife and two healthy children.

Yet he jeopardizes it all with his philandering.

Furman's old friend, Yossi (the iconic singer Arik Einstein), advises him to stop before it's too late. But he can't control himself. "I'm hooked," he says with an air of resignation.

Furman is indeed addicted to extra-marital sex.

Even in the middle of a practice with his players, he sneaks away for a quickie with Sima (Sima Elyahu), one of his mistresses.

Furman is so brazen that he sometimes brings along his toddler in tow.

But as he persists with his antics, his girlfriends grow restive, complicating his life.

Elia (Elia Zohar), Furman's sweet wife, eventually finds out that he has strayed from the marriage.

He assures her that the liaison is over and meaningless. But having lost her trust in him, she distances herself from Furman, creating turmoil in their home.

Can Furman reform himself? That's the implicit question.

Big Eyes, a low-budget production, has a stripped-down, somewhat dated feel to it. However, the human emotions in it, and the lessons to be learned, are timeless.

Zohar, who appears in virtually every frame, dominates the film by the sheer force of his personality.

Sima Elyahu

As a lustful, frantic and even pathetic figure, he's quite convincing.

Given Zohar's conversion to Orthodox Judaism later in his career, the character he portrays in Big Eyes is totally and astonishingly at odds with the haredi person he became.

Relax and pamper yourself in Lewiston, New York

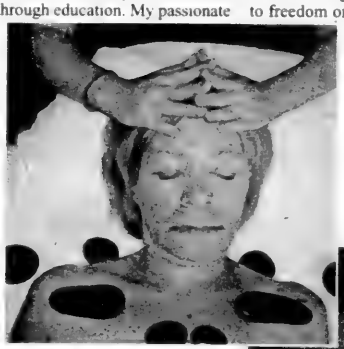
By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

The luxurious spa at Barton Hill, at the Barton Hill Hotel & Spa in Lewiston, N.Y., may seem like a world away, but it's just across the Niagara River from Canada.

The 1840s building with turn-of-the-century décor, reminiscent of Buffalo's Golden Age, has a colourful past. Originally, it was owned by the Trafford family, who made their money in textiles. It has served as a saloon, restaurant, designer show home and even a brothel.

The relaxing experience begins the moment you arrive.

"We believe as a spa that people are coming here to not only experience wellness and relaxation, but to gain knowledge on how they can bring wellness and relaxation into their own lives after they leave the spa," says Gregory LoBue, spa director of The Spa at Barton Hill, which opened its doors in 2007. "We provide that through education. My passionate therapists pass information on during each of their therapies."



A hot stone treatment.

The Spa's main floor includes guest reception, a relaxation area and retail space, a haircutting floor, shampoo and hair therapy area and a pedicure station. There are five treatment rooms on the second floor, which are used for both esthetics and massage, including the aromatherapy room. There are also rooms in the hotel for guests who want private services or for groups such as wedding parties.

Spa services include hair therapy, waxing, cosmetics, massage therapies and reflexology, facial and body treatments, manicures and tubeless, germ-free pedicures using a Roman-style pedicure bowl instead of jets.

"Our most popular treatments include the Spa Signature Hot Stone Pedicure, Spa Signature Massage that comes with a take-home scented soy candle, the Spa Signature Facial, which involves hot stones, chakra realignment and a finishing body spritz," LoBue says.

"The Spa has partnered with Fran LaRocca of Sentir Aromatherapy who has 28 years of experience as an aromatherapist," LoBue says.

"What makes our union with Sentir unique is she makes organic and natural products for our treatments here. You can go with one of her pre-blended scents or customize your own. Her aromaspa is core now to The Spa. People can take home a liquid memory of their day here at the spa."

In addition to the aromatherapist, spa staff includes two estheticians, four hairstylists, three nail technicians, five massage therapists, three receptionists and part-timers who are brought in when necessary.

The Spa offers several packages, including a variety of spa/hotel packages – some including meals at The Chantry, the hotel's lobby restaurant. With advance notice, kosher meals from Alt Fine Foods, under the supervision of Va'ad HaKashrut of Buffalo, headed by Rabbi Moshe Taub, can be ordered.

A favourite spa/hotel package is The Three R's of Romance, which includes one night in the hotel, dinner with a bottle of house wine, champagne in your room and a couples 60-minute massage or spa pedicures.

Product lines used in The Spa include the hair products L'Anza from Italy; Rusk; Sebastian; Goldwell, and John Masters Organics. For the skin, the spa carries Skeyndor from Spain and Murad. OPI is used for nails, and for makeup, it's Enjoue.

The Spa's clientele is 70 per cent female, except for massage, which is a 50-50 split. Its clientele is also split in the middle when it comes to tourists and locals. The Spa also caters to families, offering children's haircuts, pedicures and manicures.

After years of travelling, hometown girl Diane Finkbeiner came back to the Lewiston area with husband, Ed, to open Barton Hill Hotel & Spa – a deluxe boutique hotel resort featuring king- and queen-sized beds. Some of the modern, warm, chic rooms boast fireplaces, Whirlpool-style tubs or large showers, which general manager Jeff Deming affectionately calls "party showers." The Barton Hill has a Rolls-Royce with a chauffeur to boot! Lucky guests can feel like VIPs when they book a wine or shopping tour and travel the area in sophisticated style!

The Barton Hill Hotel & Spa is in the heart of Lewiston, the launching point for the War of 1812 and the last stop to freedom on the Underground Railroad. When not being pampered at The Spa, outlet mall shopping or taking the Niagara Wine Trail USA tour, activities can include a visit to see artisans at Art Park, catching free summer concerts at the park every Tuesday night or taking a Whirlpool Jet Boat Tour – a very wet and wild experience on the Niagara River.

ISRAELI BIRD MIGRATION EXPERT IS SUBJECT OF NEW CHILDREN'S BOOK

Yossi Leshem, an Israeli pioneer in bird migration, has become a world expert in collisions between airplanes and birds of the sort that downed a US Airways flight several months ago in the Hudson River, miraculously without a single human casualty.

Leshem has helped save the lives of Israeli Air Force pilots as well as millions of dollars in destroyed aircraft by tracking bird migration patterns, keeping aircraft and birds safely apart. Using a silent glider, motorized only for takeoff and landing, Leshem has soared with eagles, storks, pelicans and other species for up to 11 hours at a time.

Toronto publisher Monarch Books is offering a lovely new children's book about this important Israeli ornithologist and his work. The Man Who Flies With Birds, by Carole Garbuny Vogel and Yossi Leshem, details the research in clear prose illustrated with colour photographs on every page. This inviting book is suitable for readers from grade five and up. For more information, call 416-663-8231.

Author brings Jewish heroines of the past to life

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

Most secular Jews know the stories of Rebecca and Rachel and Eve. But how many know the story of Zelophehad's daughters Mahlah, Noa, Hoglah, Milcah and Tirzah, who petitioned Moses to be treated fairly in lieu of male offspring, and be permitted to inherit land in Israel? By winning that appeal, the women set the precedent in Jewish tradition for equality in laws of inheritance.

Their story and the stories of other lesser known female characters from Jewish history have been brought to life by Canadian author Alice Lehrer's first book, If We Could Hear Them Now: Encounters with Jewish Heroines of the Past (Urim, Jerusalem).

Alice Lehrer

"The idea behind the book was to breathe life into some of Judaism's greatest heroines in a way that would be interesting and easy for secular Jews in particular to connect to," says Lehrer, who visited Israel recently to meet with the book's publisher and to attend a lay leadership seminar for Jewish educators at the Hartman Institute in Jerusalem about the chassidic movement.

"Interestingly, this week I learned about the teachings of Rav Nachman, who anticipated what would happen when the secular world became too great, and who devised ways to bring secular Jews back to 'God consciousness,'" says Lehrer, an adult educator at the Bronfman Jewish Education Centre and David Weissman Institute in Montreal.

> 'We all have the potential to be heroes'

"That was very much my objective in writing this book – to increase the quotient of Jewish literacy among less connected Jews, to open a link for the next generation to hook into the great chain of Jewish history, and to take these stories off the shelves of synagogues and study halls and put them into the hands of young, modern readers.

"Today, when everything is being renewed on a weekly basis, and the latest iPod comes out every week, people aren't looking back as much. They think of history as a bit shabby," continues Lehrer. "I wanted to shine a light on what has made us and what has brought us to where we are now. It's important to be reminded of where we come from."

The result is a 175-page book profiling 13 female characters from various eras of Jewish history: biblical, talmudic, Middle Ages, pre-modern and modern. The book is structured as a series of dialogues in chronological order with one central interviewer, and each chapter profiles a different heroine, who tells her story in historical context and addresses questions regarding her Jewish identity, sense of people-hood, and vision of the future, in modern voice.

Although Lehrer's aim was to make the characters and their stories relevant to the here and now, she says strict attention was given to historical accuracy. "I tried as much as possible to keep their words as true to what we know of them from text and commentary," she says, adding that the book has been endorsed by Gil Troy, a professor of history at McGill University, Chief Rabbi Sir Jonathan Sacks of the United Hebrew Congregations of the Commonwealth, and Elisheva Baumgarten, a lecturer in the departments of Jewish history and gender studies at Bar-Ilan University.

As for the characters she chose to profile, Lehrer says she picked those to whom she feels most connected. "I picked the figures that spoke to me the most," she says, listing, from the biblical era, Tamar, Serah bat Asher, Miriam, Tzipora, Hannah (mother of the prophet Samuel), Deborah, Ruth and Esther; from the talmudic period, Rachel, the wife of Rabbi Akiva; from the Middle Ages, Rashi's daughters; from the early modern period, Dona Gracia Nasi of Portugal; and, from the modern period, the American Henrietta Szold.

The book's profile subjects are just the tip of the iceberg, the structure of the work easily allowing for future editions portraying other figures of Jewish history.

"I don't want to be a one-book wonder," says Lehrer. "I intend to continue writing these interview-style profiles – the list of subjects is endless." Next up: male heroes of Jewish history. But, she says: "I am not sure who yet right now. I am taking the time to see who chooses me."

For Lehrer, If We Could Hear Them Now is more than just a first feat in publishing. It is a personal project. An occupational therapist by training, after owning a private healthcare company called Orthosport in Montreal and leading a fairly secular life for most of her life, Lehrer switched tracks some 22 years ago, at the age of 40, to pursue her passion for Jewish learning and teaching, full time.

"This book is my response to people very much like myself, who are thirsty for a greater connection to their heritage but whose lives are busy with the business of life and who don't have the time or the inclination to take a course in Jewish history and Bible, but who do have time for leisure reading," says Lehrer.

"The book conveys the message that we all have the potential to step out of our comfort zone and change the world, even if it's just our own world or community. We all have the potential to be heroes."

The disconnect from heritage of which Lehrer speaks is as much a problem among Jews living outside of Israel as it is in Israel, where the secular-religious cultural divide is even more pronounced, and where secular Jews tend to feel alienated by all things religious. For this reason, Lehrer says she hopes to eventually have the book translated into Hebrew.

"This book could be a sort of soft bridge to our history and traditions for secular Jews in Israel, without being too heavy or politicized," she says.

The book's English launch is scheduled to take place this month when If We Could Hear Them Now: Encounters with Jewish Heroines of the Past will be available in bookstores, including Chapters and Indigo in Canada and Bibliophile in Montreal, Barnes & Noble in the United States, Steimatzky in Israel and online at Amazon.com. The official launch party takes place at the Jewish Public Library in Montreal on Oct. 28.

Ryerson student creates Holocaust short

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

Don't pay attention to the title

So Soon Forgotten, a 15-minute short made by a Ryerson University film student that was screened at the recent Montreal World Film Festival, should not be

Written and directed by Toronto native Zack Bernbaum and produced by fellow Ryersonian Josh Clavir, So Soon Forgotten tells the fictional story of a Polish Jew who disguises himself as an SS officer and succeeds in having train number 0539 – full of Hungarian Jews bound for death at Auschwitz – diverted.

Over a three-month period in 1944, 400,000 Jews in Nazi-occupied Hungary were deported to the death camp.

Bernbaum said the story, while essentially a work of fiction, was inspired by a couple of sentences he read in an article about a Hungarian Jew (Bernbaum made him into a Polish Jew for the film) who, according to anecdotal accounts, disguised himself as an SS officer named Otto Teibeth and went out of his way to save Jewish lives.

While there's no definitive proof that Teibeth ever had an actual train diverted, this doesn't diminish So Soon Forgotten one bit.

That's because the film is so polished, tautly edited and high in production values, you'd think it was shot at a major film studio on a million-dollar budget

In reality, according to an article on Ryerson's website, So Soon Forgotten took only a week to shoot in the Halton Hills region with money raised privately (Ryerson didn't help fund the film, nor did any government agency).

According to the article, Bernbaum also has a personal connection to the story. Two of his grandparents are Holocaust survivors, and he made a documentary about his grandmother, Helen, surviving a slave labour camp and death march. As preparation for So Soon Forgotten, he travelled to Auschwitz in order to recreate as accurately as possible in Halton Hills what things actually looked like in Poland

It can safely be stated that, along with the film's riveting realism and pacing, Bernbaum succeeded beyond any expectation, even if the idea of a Jewish man supposedly posing as an SS officer and stopping a train stretches credulity to its limits.

Surely more important, as the film's publicity material states, So Soon Forgotten "is a story about human decency and the willingness to put oneself at risk for the sake of others… how against all odds, one man can make a difference and be a guiding light in the darkest of times."

So Soon Forgotten is due to be screened this fall at the Vancouver and Boston Jewish film festivals. There's no word yet on a Toronto screening.

ISRAELI FILM PREMIERE:

The Toronto Jewish Film Festival is presenting the Canadian premiere of the Israeli film Bruriah. Paralleling a battle of the sexes from the second century, this modern day Bruriah sets out on a personal crusade in which she confronts her desires and limitations. The film, a contemporary revisiting of a little-known biblical tale, will be introduced by Rabbi Tina Grimberg of Congregation Darchei Noam, Sept. 23 at the Varsity 3, Manulife Centre, 55 Bloor St. W., Toronto, at 7:30 p.m. Tickets, $18, can be purchased at the box office or www.tjff.com or 416-324-9121. This is the first of 18 events culminating on opening night of the TJFF's 18th festival next April.

Jewish beach volleyball players at top of their sport

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Maccabi Canada's men's indoor volleyball team did something at this summer's Maccabiah Games they never did before they won a medal – bronze to be precise.

The accomplishment is particularly noteworthy in that several key players who were shoo-ins to make the team were unavailable for the Games. Some were otherwise involved in playing for or training with Canada's national beach volleyball team.

Nevertheless, said Daniel Shermer, a member of the medal-winning squad along with his brothers, Elie and Joshua, the Canadians played well and with a full lineup could probably have challenged Israel for the gold.

As it happens, there is a wealth of Jewish volleyball talent in Canada these days – not just good club players, but athletes at the very top of the Canadian rankings in the beach version of the sport.

Shermer is not exactly sure why that's the case, but the list of players who didn't make it to Israel is almost long enough to fill a starting lineup: Josh Binstock, Aaron Nusbaum, Cole Grossinger and Sam Schachter.

He believes those athletes, though primarily beach players, would have acclimatized to the indoor sport quite readily.

The four attended different public schools and developed their skills separately. "So it's pure chance," that all of them became so good, Shermer said.

"It's the luck of the draw, and it so happens that we're raising a ruckus now. You don't hear about that in a lot of sports."

At the top of Shermer's list is Binstock. At six-foot-six, "he's a phenomenal all-round athlete… He has the wingspan of someone who's six-foot-nine. He's got a great body for beach volleyball. He's been working his ass off since he was 15. He's put in the time to get to the level he's at."

Binstock, 28, missed the Maccabiah Games to represent Canada on the FIVB World Tour. An Olympic hopeful, he's won back to back Canadian National Beach Volleyball Championships.

Nusbaum, 16, "has far beyond the average skill level of most 16-year-olds in this country." He's six-foot-one and can jump 35 inches in the sand, Shermer said. "He has a huge determination to win."

The winner of the 16-and-under Canadian beach championships, Nusbaum was competing in the national championship at Ashbridges Bay during the Maccabiah Games.

Grossinger is one of the smaller athletes in his sport, but his natural abilities allow him to compete against kids four or five inches taller. "He's just extremely skilled. He's not overpowering, but that's where the true essence of finesse comes out." Grossinger is excellent at ball control, and his mental toughness is remarkable, Shermer said.

Grossinger won the 14-and-under national beach volleyball championship, he added.

Schachter, along with Binstock, is a member of the national beach volleyball team. He regularly competes against older athletes, and with his six-foot-four frame and "great vertical jump," he's "a phenomenal indoor player," Shermer said.

Schachter recently finished ninth in the open men's beach volleyball championship. As a member of Team Canada, he participated in the 2008 FIVB World Youth 19 and under World Championships in The Hague, Netherlands.

Shermer, 26, admits to being a little past his best playing days. Instead he's focusing on growing the sport – something that should come naturally given his pedigree. His father, George, is one of the principals behind Beach Blast, an indoor facility that serves as the training centre for the Canadian beach team, and is a former coach for the Canadian Maccabiah team.

Daniel coaches young players and plans to offer Jewish schools volleyball development programs as extracurricular activities. That would include training coaches and developing players.

"I want to share my passion with as many kids and coaches as possible," he said.

Pressel comeback falls short at CN Canadian Open

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

After the second round of the $2.75-million (all figures US) CN Canadian Open, American professional golfer Morgan Pressel wasn't optimistic about scoring a victory.

Her two round total of 142 had her in 49th place, nine strokes behind leader and eventual winner Suzann Pettersen. She was closer to not making the cut than winning the event.

Despite the high winds at the Priddis Golf Club in Calgary, Pressel adjusted to the conditions and in the final two rounds, she made an almost Tiger Woods-like comeback. She scored two consecutive rounds of five-under-par 66s, capping off her third-round score – the lowest on the day – with a 30-foot eagle on the 18th hole. That left her in 10th place, nine strokes behind Pettersen.

In a live television broadcast on CBC, Pressel continued to excel in the final round with a birdie on the fifth, three consecutive birdies from the seventh to ninth holes, and two more birdies on the 12th and 16th holes. Despite a bogey on the 13th, when Pressel placed her second shot in the water, she finished as runner-up with a 10-under-par 274, five strokes behind Pettersen and tied with four others, winning $157,477. It was her largest paycheque in 2009.

"I was so happy to put everything together this weekend, as I was so close to not making the cut. My goal today was to play as well as I can and to make as many birdies as possible," Pressel said after her finish.

"Morgan's persistence and belief in herself makes her excel, no matter how far behind she is from the leader. She will continue to be a top contender in the LPGA for many years to come," former LPGA golfer Judy Rankin said on CBC.

Morgan Pressel

Pressel's runner-up finish was the best performance by a Jewish golfer in an LPGA Canadian tournament since American Amy Alcott won the 1979 Du Maurier Classic in Montreal. The 21-year-old Pressel rebounded from her 32nd place finish at the 2008 Canadian Open in Ottawa, where she was the guest of honour at a reception hosted by Maccabi Canada.

"I was so excited to have met some wonderful people at the reception last year, and I'm always proud of being Jewish. Although I'm not Canadian, I was elated by being considered a crowd favourite in both Calgary and Ottawa. I definitely will be playing in the Canadian Open for many years to come," Pressel said.

Her second-place finish at the Canadian Open was only her second runner-up finish this season, along with the Jamie Farr Classic in July. Her ranking improved from 26th to 22nd, and she's now 17th on the money list this year with $507,581, and she's earned $2.6 million over her four-year career.

Pressel achieved fame by becoming the youngest major winner in LPGA history when at only 18 years, and 10 months old, she took the Kraft Nabisco Championships (Alcott also won that event). In 2001, when Pressel was 12, she became the youngest golfer ever to qualify for the U.S. Women's Open. Pressel's other LPGA victory was the Kapalua Classic in 2008.

The Boca Raton, Fla., native learned golf from her grandfather, Herb Krickstein, who was also a mentor to his son, American tennis star Aaron Krickstein, who was ranked sixth in the world in 1989.

Since the death of Pressel's mother, Kathy, to breast cancer at age 43, Morgan has raised more than $800,000 at her own annual fund-raising golf tournament.

CNE honours sporting Stars of the Past

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Two prominent sportsmen – one a fastball player, the other a softball umpire – were honoured recently by the Canadian National Exhibition as part of its Stars of the Past tribute.

Fastball first baseman Harry Eckler and softball umpire Maxie Scheff were recipients of the honour, Scheff posthumously.

Eckler was described by Paula Warder, who presented the athletes' biographies at the tribute, as "one of Canada's best first basemen ever."

In a career that began at Harbord Playground in the 1930s, Eckler went on to win numerous city and provincial championships. In 1942, he played on Tip Top Tailor's Canadian championship team, and in 1950, he was on People's Credit Jeweller's city, provincial and Canadian championship squad.

A member of the Canadian Softball Hall of Fame, Eckler also got the opportunity to play against boxer Joe Louis' famed Championship Team in an exhibition at the CNE.

Following his retirement from competitive fastball, Eckler spent 25 years in the nightclub business with partners Joe Krol of the Toronto Argonauts and boxer Sammy Luftspring. Together they operated the Mercury Club on Victoria Street. The after-hours club was a mecca for visiting entertainers and the city's sporting elite.

Scheff was described by Warder as "Canada's most dominant personality in softball as a player, umpire and executive member."

His career spanned 50 years, during which he served as Ontario's Umpire-in-Chief from 1935 to 1960. He umpired for men, women and children's games across the province and, Warder noted, organized umpire clinics across Canada.

He officiated at the Cleveland World Championships for two seasons and called the final game in the 1947 tournament.

Scheff started his career as a fastball player with the famed Lizzies playground team. He won a provincial championship in 1929.

He switched to softball and won two provincial titles and was 1931 batting champ for the Yolles-Hertzle team.

Scheff also played hardball for the Jewish Community League at Bellwoods Park, Warder noted.

After retiring from playing, he turned to umping and was umpire in chief for the CNE from 1936 to 1980.

Since 2002, the CNE has been honouring softball players or officials who played at the Ex.

What kind of couple are you?

NEW TO CANADA
By NINA SHENHAV

Everybody says we're a friendly couple

Actually, there's kind of an amazing dynamic between us. While I sit with you and talk till dawn, Meir will be nodding in the background and noticeably mute.

The truth is that, individually, neither of us is very friendly. We're moody, edgy and persnickety – but, hey, nobody has to know that as long as we come across nicely as a couple.

So let's talk about couples. They're very easy to categorize.

• The "just about to divorce" couple

We're talking about two killer beasts that barbaric fate has brought together and who may even have produced offspring.

When you invite them over, they'll never sit next to each other. He'll contradict every word that comes out of her mouth, and she'll give him icy gazes.

You'll say: "So, Sharon, I've heard you bought a new couch. What colour is it?"

Sharon: "Blue."

Dan: "That's the most obscene colour in the world."

Sharon: "You don't want to start talking about obscene things, do you?"

Dan: "You don't have any taste."

Sharon (while examining him): "You're so right."

• The "blue movie" couple

They're the kind of people who won't stop kissing and licking each other like puppies.

You'll say: "So, Sharon, I've heard you bought a new couch. What colour is it?"

Sharon: "Happy bluish – the kind of colour Danny likes?"

Dan: "My Sharon has the best taste ever!"

Sharon: "Danny looks great in everything!"

Dan: "It's you who inspire me!"

Sharon: "Isn't he amazing?" – they kiss – "Isn't he? – she gives him a small bite, then a lick, and it goes on and on…

• The "it's so expensive" couple

They'll never invite you over. They're always renovating, or their dog isn't well, or their cat is allergic to strangers, or they bought a new blue couch that you can't sit on yet.

You'd say: "So, Sharon, I've heard you bought a new couch. What colour is it?"

Sharon: "Why ask about the colour? Ask how much it cost us!"

Dan: "We have to stop eating for a month. Our life's savings has gone down the drain."

Sharon: "The cake you're serving is $4.49, right?

Dan: "That's a nice quiche. Sharon made one yesterday, but without eggs, mushrooms and cheese."

• The "it costs nothing" couple

Apparently, they're a desirable couple. They like to spend money, their house is extravagant, and they only wear "haute couture," etc.

Well, you already know the couch routine.

Sharon: "Blue. And it cost us nothing. Pennies, I tell you."

Dan: "Did you know that next to the furniture store, they've opened a new restaurant?"

Sharon: "Nouvelle cuisine – only $800 dollars for an entree."

Dan: "Let's all go tomorrow!"

• The "two old ladies" couple

He likes to gossip no less than she does. There's no need to ask about the couch, because there are so many interesting things to talk about! In the beginning, it feels like bliss. It's fun to agree that it looks like Jerry is getting fired, Susan is getting fatter, their eldest daughter is going out with a non-Jewish guy, and their youngest son is going out with a Jewish boy.

But when they leave, while you're washing the dishes, you feel drained and violated, because you never know what they could be saying about you.

• Finally, there's the "reticent monastery" couple

And we're back to the couch, and the question about its colour.

Sharon: "Blue."

Dan: "Yes."

And that's it.

So, hand on your heart, which couple are you?

SPINACH AND CHEESE STRATA

1 pkg thawed frozen spinach
2c. grated Gruyère cheese
3 tblsp. unsalted butter
1 tsp. salt
1/4 tsp. nutmeg
9 eggs
1 lg. chopped onion
1c. grated Parmesan cheese
8 c 1" cubed crusty bread
1/2 tsp. pepper
2 3/4 c. milk
2 tbls. Dijon mustard

Squeeze spinach to remove liquid. Finely chop. Cook onion in butter in large skillet over moderate heat, stirring 4-5 min. Add 1/2 tsp salt, 1/4 tsp. pepper, nutmeg; cook, stirring 1 min. Add spinach; remove from heat. Spread 1/3 bread cubes in buttered 3-quart baking dish, top evenly with 1/3 spinach mixture. Sprinkle with 1/3 of each cheese. Repeat layering twice (ending with cheeses). Whisk together milk, eggs, mustard, remaining salt and pepper in large bowl, pour evenly over strata. Chill, covered with plastic wrap, at least 8 hrs. Preheat oven to 350F. Let strata stand at room temperature 30 min. Bake uncovered until puffed, golden brown, 45-55 min. Let stand 5 minutes before serving.

Life after knee surgery

FITNESS CORNER
By FELYCE ZOMPARELLI

My grandmother came to Toronto recently. I love seeing her. I can't tell you her real age, because she would probably kill me, but let's just say she is very much a senior citizen. She was a fitness instructor and is still incredibly fit.

Last year, she had to have surgery to replace one of her knees. She ran about 20 kilometres a day for 45 years, so eventually it took its toll on her joint. The year before the surgery was really bad – my overly active grandmother who ran, played tennis for two hours a day, swam an hour and then did ballroom dancing could hardly do anything. Finally, she had the surgery; most people think that ends the pain and relief begins. That is just not true.

My grandmother is far from lazy and definitely not scared of hard work, so she went to work to heal her knee. She and I talk health and wellness all the time; they are a shared passion, so when she shared with me how much pain she was in after her knee surgery, I was surprised.

She attended physiotherapy every day. After that, she went to the weight room and worked with a personal trainer, which she had never done before, then yoga and finally, a swim. She stretched and strengthened and stretched some more, four hours a day, until finally eight months after surgery she started to notice that her knee wasn't bothering her any more.

I remember a conversation we had about five months into her rehabilitation, and my grandmother said, "I don't care how much it hurts. I am determined to do what I have to, to get better."

Well, 13 months after surgery, my grandmother decided to walk from St George subway station in downtown Toronto to Wilson station to visit with me and my kids. Unbelievable, right? Wrong! My grandmother is just another success story, which tells you that no matter what your age, if you work hard and don't give up, you will succeed.

A yom tov prayer

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

Oh God, we ask that our world becomes a place in 5770 where the sick become well and goodness is rewarded. When we stand before you, in white and shoeless, we pray that the child who is neglected is embraced and we ask that the lonely woman discovers love.

On the High Holidays, when we ever so seriously look at the past year, naked with sincerity and honesty, and dressed finely in a cloak of humility, we will recall those things we did to others – man, women or child – of a positive nature, and celebrate them, and use them this year as a launching pad for more goodness.

We pledge to examine those feelings and thoughts within us that evolved into actions, measures and events that hurt others. That was not our objective. Please know it was not our goal to set out on a trek to bring pain to humankind. It is clear that such hurt damages our soul, punctures the heart of the recipient and deflates the world. That was not our intention. Regardless, we will overcome.

In 5770, we strive to know and remember the sacrifice of so many Jews and non-Jews who lived and died, fought and were wounded, to establish and build our holy space on this globe – the State of Israel. Within our prayers and deep thought, a stark image will appear in our mind's eye of the Israeli father and mother who sat by their phone while their child was at war, waiting to hear his or her voice.

And God bless our survivors. God bless the world's survivors.

In 5770, we will recognize how blessed we are to live in a time without conscription, so we Canadians will not see a uniformed soldier coming up our walkway on a gloomy sunny morning. How lucky we are God, how blessed we are that Canada is neither the Congo or Darfur. How easy it is to forget that our children go to university while others march with guns. Shalom, peace, should prevail.

This year, God, we will choose a deed pertaining to kindness, affixed to truth, and make it our own. It may be the truth of tzedakah or that of welcoming guests. We will ensconce ourselves in the plight to free the world's 12 million slaves, or feed the orphans, or we may decide to invite a homeless woman into our homes or deliver food to the famished. We pray that evil disappears.

In 5770, my inner work will require me to be honest with you, those I love, and mostly me. It is the year when I will finally see that the pursuit of money and riches sacrifices the wealth of knowledge I could have instead. Power, status and ego will not be the traits spoken of me after my final days. I need to know this in health, as I might learn it in illness. I need to know that in those moments when another contract was signed, I could have instead tucked in my child.

In 5770, I commit to consider that Torah and Judaism is more than just a club, but instead a porthole to truth. I will not take Israel for granted. I will teach my children the same. I will let them know that teachers who know little of our history and peoplehood should not be defining who we are and how we should grow.

In 5770, through my own pursuit, help from others and a belief in a better me and world, I will be a person who is one step above who I was last year. Thank you for these days.

Responding to our government's request that organizations accept responsibility for assisting enlistment for active service, the undersigned organizations have deemed it their duty to come to the Canadian Jewish able-bodied young men the following

Declaration

THE undersigned organizations of the Jewish Community, of the district of Montreal, sanction and whole-heartedly approve of the activity initiated by the War Efforts Committee of the Canadian Jewish Congress to stimulate recruiting of Jewish able-bodied young men. We express our just pride and admiration for the thousands of Canadian Jews who have already joined the ranks. Our country is at war with a cruel and merciless enemy who has vowed to destroy the British Empire and our people. We fervently hope that every eligible young Canadian Jew will proudly answer the call and will enlist at once in the Canadian Army, Navy or Air Force.

The year's Rosh Hashanah Greetings supplement commemorates 70 years since the start of World War II. Its theme is the Jewish world as it was on Sept. 1, 1939.

We asked a number of renowned writers and scholars to paint portraits of communities throughout the Jewish world. Some of the contributors appear in the pages of The CJN for the first time. For example, acclaimed author Mary Doria Russell has written about the Italkim, the Jews of Italy. Prof. Devora Hacohen of Bar Ilan University describes the conditions in the Yishuv. Rabbi Marc D. Angel has written about the Sephardi world. There are many more outstanding writers in the supplement, as well as a great deal of touching, heart-rending, important information to read.

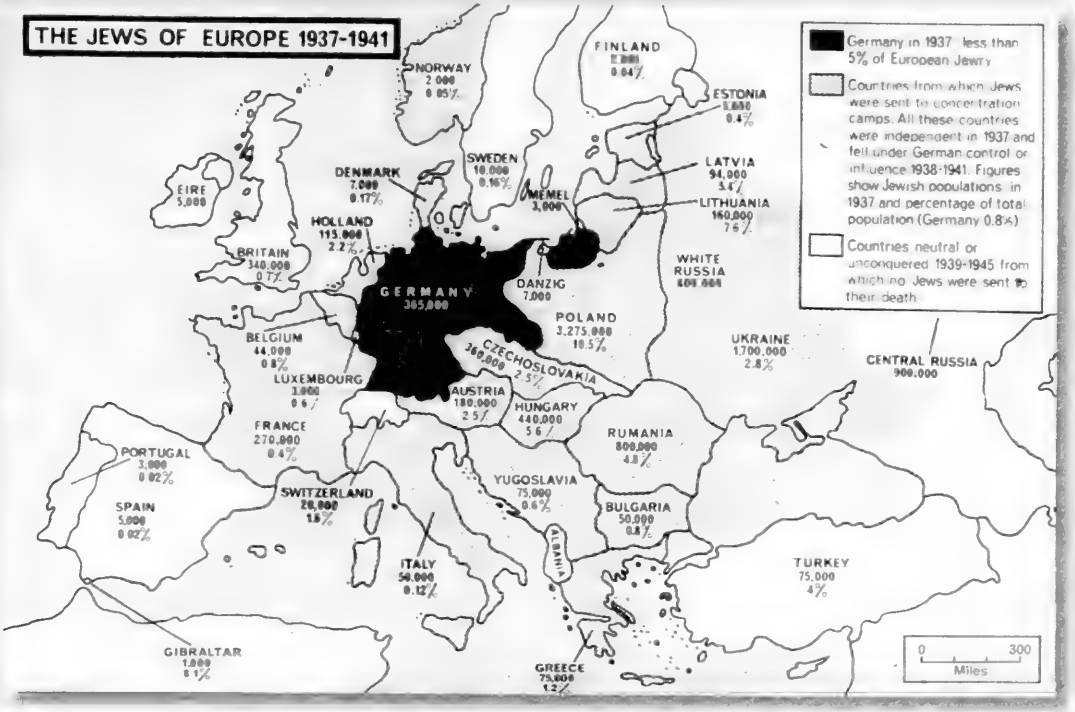
Above is a photo of the gathering of the World Zionist Congress in Geneva that convened on the eve of war, in August 1939. The downcast, worried expressions on the faces of Chaim Weizmann, centre, and David Ben-Gurion, to his right, starkly convey the feelings of darkness and despair that were even then overtaking the Jewish and indeed, the entire civilized world.

The Declaration, left, provided us by the Canadian Jewish Congress Charities Committee National Archives, was the clarion, principled, courageous and elegant response of Canadian Jews who determined to join in tearing away the Nazi curtain that was then descending over Europe and over the lives of every Jew there.

This supplement is not about the Shoah and the horrors that were soon to befall the world. Rather the material in the upcoming pages tries to fill in some of the elements of a large, moving, beautiful portrait of who we were on Sept. 1, 1939.

It is our hope that this supplement will provide readers with contemplative reading at the start of the new year 5770.

The Editor



The map above and the other historical maps in this supplement are reproduced from Jewish History Atlas, Martin Gilbert (Wiedenfeld and Nicolson, London, 1973). More than any other modern historian, Sir Martin has devoted his career to chronicling, explaining and making accessible to lay and expert readers alike, the history of the Jewish people in its myriad dramatic aspects. We owe him a profound debt of gratitude. The editor

'Action rather than speech is required'

By NEVILLE CHAMBERLAIN

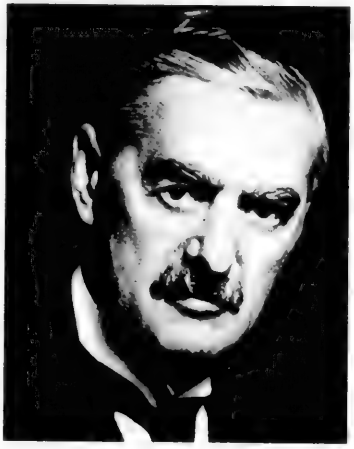
The following is an address made in the British House of Commons on Sept. 1, 1939, when Chamberlain was prime minister of the United Kingdom

I do not propose to say many words tonight. The time has come when action rather than speech is required. Eighteen months ago in this House, I prayed that the responsibility might not fall upon me to ask this country to accept the awful arbitrament of war. I fear that I may not be able to avoid that responsibility. But, at any rate, I cannot wish for conditions in which such a burden should fall upon me in which I should feel clearer than I do today as to where my duty lies

No man can say that the government could have done more to try to keep open the way for an honourable and equitable settlement of the dispute between Germany and Poland. Nor have we neglected any means of making it crystal clear to the German government that if they insisted on using force again in the manner in which they had used it in the past, we were resolved to oppose them by force. Now that all the relevant documents are being made public, we shall stand at the bar of history knowing that the responsibility for this terrible catastrophe lies on the shoulders of one man – the German chancellor, who has not hesitated to plunge the world into misery in order to serve his own senseless ambitions

I would like to thank the House for the forbearance which they have shown on two recent occasions for not demanding from me information which they recognized I could not give while these negotiations were still in progress. I have now had all the correspondence with the German government put into the form of a White Paper.

On account of mechanical difficulties, I am afraid there are still but a few copies available, but I understand that they will be coming in in relays while the House is sitting. I do not think it necessary for me to refer in detail now to these documents, which are already past history. They make it perfectly clear that our object has been to try and bring about discussions of the Polish-German dispute between the two countries themselves on terms of equality, the settlement to be one which safeguards the independence of Poland and of which the due observance would be secured by international guarantees.



Neville Chamberlain

There is just one passage from a recent communication, which is dated the 30th August, which I should like to quote, because it shows how easily the final clash might have been avoided had there been the least desire on the part of the German government to arrive at a peaceful settlement.

In this document, we said: "His Majesty's government fully recognize the need for speed in the initiation of discussions and they share the apprehensions of the chancellor arising from the proximity of two mobilized armies standing face to face. They would accordingly most strongly urge that both parties should undertake that during the negotiations, no aggressive military movements should take place. His Majesty's government feel confident that they could obtain such an undertaking from the Polish government if the German government would give similar assurances."

That telegram, which was repeated in Poland, brought an instantaneous reply from the Polish government, dated the 31st of August, in which they said: "The Polish government are also prepared on a reciprocal basis to give a formal guarantee, in the event of negotiations taking place, that Polish troops will not violate the frontiers of the German Reich provided a corresponding guarantee is given regarding the non-violation of the frontiers of Poland by troops of the German Reich."

'Germany claims to treat Poland as in the wrong'

We never had a reply from the German government to that suggestion, one which, if it had been followed, might have saved the catastrophe which took place this morning. In the German broadcast last night, which recited the 16 points of the proposals which they have put forward, there occurred this sentence: "In these circumstances the Reich government considers its proposals rejected."

I must examine that statement. I must tell the House what the circumstances are. To begin with let me say that the text of these proposals has never been communicated by Germany to Poland at all. The history of the matter is this. On Tuesday, the 29th August, in replying to a note which we had sent to them, the German government said, among other things, that they would immediately draw up proposals for a solution acceptable to themselves and "will, if possible, place these at the disposal of the British government before the arrival of the Polish negotiator."

It will be seen by examination of the White Paper that the German government had stated that they counted upon the arrival of a plenipotentiary from Poland in Berlin on the 30th – that is to say, on the following day. In the meantime, of course, we were awaiting these proposals. The next evening, when our ambassador saw Herr von Ribbentrop, the German foreign secretary, he urged upon the latter that when these proposals were ready – for we had heard no more about them – he should invite the Polish ambassador to call and should hand him the proposals for transmission to his government. Thereupon, reports our ambassador, in the most violent terms, Herr von Ribbentrop said he would never ask the ambassador to visit him. He hinted that if the Polish ambassador asked him for an interview it might be different.

The House will see that this was on Wednesday night, which according to the German Statement of last night, is now claimed to be the final date after which no negotiation with Poland was acceptable. It is plain, therefore, that Germany claims to treat Poland as in the wrong because she had not by Wednesday night entered upon discussions with Germany about a set of proposals of which she had never heard.

Now what of ourselves?

On that Wednesday night, at the interview to which I have just referred, Herr von Ribbentrop produced a lengthy document which he read out in German aloud, at top speed. Naturally, after this reading our ambassador asked for a copy of the document, but the reply was that it was now too late, as the Polish representative had not arrived in Berlin by midnight. And so, Sir, we never got a copy of those proposals, and the first time we heard them – we heard them – was on the broadcast last night.

Attacks on Polish towns are proceeding

Well, Sir, those are the circumstances in which the German government said that they would consider that their negotiations were rejected.

Is it not clear that their conception of a negotiation was that on almost instantaneous demand, a Polish plenipotentiary should go to Berlin – where others had been before him – and should there receive a statement of demands to be accepted in their entirety or refused? I am not pronouncing any opinion upon the terms themselves, for I do not feel called upon to do so.

The proper course, in our view – in the view of all of us – was that these proposals should have been put before the Poles, who should have been given time to consider them and to say whether, in their opinion, they did or did not infringe those vital interests of Poland which Germany had assured us on a previous occasion she intended to respect.

Only last night, the Polish ambassador did see the German foreign secretary, Herr von Ribbentrop. Once again, he expressed to him what, indeed, the Polish government had already said publicly, that they were willing to negotiate with Germany about their disputes on an equal basis. What was the reply of the German Government? The reply was that without another word, the German troops crossed the Polish frontier this morning at dawn and are since reported to be bombing open towns. In these circumstances, there is only one course open to us.

His Majesty's ambassador in Berlin and the French ambassador have been instructed to hand to the German government the following document: "Early this morning, the German chancellor issued a proclamation to the German army which indicated that he was about to attack Poland. Information which has reached His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and the French government indicates that attacks upon Polish towns are proceeding. In these circumstances it appears to the governments of the United Kingdom and France that by their action, the German government has created conditions, namely, an aggressive act of force against Poland threatening the independence of Poland, which call for the implementation by the governments of the United Kingdom and France of the undertaking to Poland to come to her assistance. I am accordingly to inform Your Excellency that unless the German government are prepared to give His Majesty's government satisfactory assurances that the German government have suspended all aggressive action against Poland and are prepared promptly to withdraw their forces from Polish territory, His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom will without hesitation fulfil their obligations to Poland."

> 'This morning we ordered complete mobilization of the whole of the Royal Navy, Army and Royal Air Force'

If a reply to this last warning is unfavourable, and I do not suggest that it is likely to be otherwise, His Majesty's ambassador is instructed to ask for his passports. In that case, we are ready. Yesterday, we took further steps towards the completion of our defensive preparation. This morning we ordered complete mobilization of the whole of the Royal Navy, Army and Royal Air Force. We have also taken a number of other measures, both at home and abroad, which the House will not perhaps expect me to specify in detail. Briefly, they represent the final steps in accordance with pre-arranged plans. These last can be put into force rapidly, and are of such a nature that they can be deferred until war seems inevitable. Steps have also been taken under the powers conferred by the House last week to safeguard the position in regard to stocks of commodities of various kinds.

The thoughts of many of us must at this moment inevitably be turning back to 1914 and to a comparison of our position now with that which existed then. How do we stand this time?

The answer is that all three Services are ready, and that the situation in all directions is far more favourable and reassuring than in 1914, while behind the fighting Services we have built up a vast organization of civil defence under our scheme of Air Raid Precautions.

'It remains to see the struggle to the end'

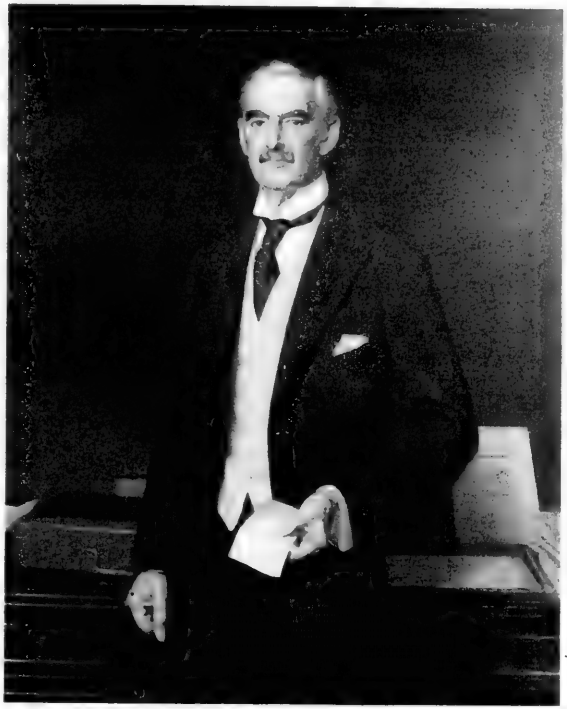
As regards the immediate manpower requirements, the Royal Navy, the Army and the Air Force are in the fortunate position of having almost as many men as they can conveniently handle at this moment. There are, however, certain categories of service in which men are immediately required, both for military and civil defence. These will be announced in detail through the press and the BBC. The main and most satisfactory point to observe is that there is today no need to make an appeal in a general way for recruits such as was issued by Lord Kitchener 25 years ago. That appeal has been anticipated by many months, and the men are already available.

So much for the immediate present. Now we must look to the future. It is essential in the face of the tremendous task which confronts us, more especially in view of our past experiences in this matter, to organize our manpower this time upon as methodical, equitable and economical a basis as possible. We therefore propose immediately to introduce legislation directed to that end. A bill will be laid before you which, for all practical purposes, will amount to an expansion of the Military Training Act.

Under its operation, all fit men between the ages of 18 and 41 will be rendered liable to military service if and when called upon. It is not intended at the outset that any considerable number of men other than those already liable shall be called up, and steps will be taken to ensure that the manpower essentially required by industry shall not be taken away.



There is one other allusion which I should like to make before I end my speech, and that is to record my satisfaction of His Majesty's government, that throughout these last days of crisis, Signor Mussolini also has been doing his best to reach a solution.

It now only remains for us to set our teeth and to enter upon this struggle, which we ourselves earnestly endeavoured to avoid, with determination to see it through to the end. We shall enter it with a clear conscience, with the support of the Dominions and the British Empire, and the moral approval of the greater part of the world.

We have no quarrel with the German people, except that they allow themselves to be governed by a Nazi government. As long as that government exists and pursues the methods it has so persistently followed during the last two years, there will be no peace in Europe. We shall merely pass from one crisis to another, and see one country after another attacked by methods which have now become familiar to us in their sickening technique.

We are resolved that these methods must come to an end. If out of the struggle we again re-establish in the world the rules of good faith and the renunciation of force, why then, even the sacrifices that will be entailed upon us will find their fullest justification.

'We are fighting to save the whole world'

By WINSTON CHURCHILL

These short remarks were given in the British House of Commons on Sept 3, 1939, the day Britain declared war on Germany and the day Churchill was appointed First Lord of the Admiralty and a member of Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain's war cabinet

Winston Churchill, May 1940

In this solemn hour, it is a consolation to recall and to dwell upon our repeated efforts for peace. All have been ill-starred, but all have been faithful and sincere.

This is of the highest moral value – and not only moral value, but practical value – at the present time, because the wholehearted concurrence of scores of millions of men and women, whose co-operation is indispensable and whose comradeship and brotherhood are indispensable, is the only foundation upon which the trial and tribulation of modern war can be endured and surmounted. This moral conviction alone affords that ever-fresh resilience which renews the strength and energy of people in long, doubtful and dark days.

Outside, the storms of war may blow and the lands may be lashed with the fury of its gales, but in our own hearts this Sunday morning there is peace. Our hands may be active, but our consciences are at rest.

We must not underrate the gravity of the task which lies before us or the temerity of the ordeal, to which we shall not be found unequal. We must expect many disappointments, and many unpleasant surprises, but we may be sure that the task which we have freely accepted is one not beyond the compass and the strength of the British Empire and the French Republic

The prime minister said it was a sad day, and that is indeed true, but at the present time, there is another note which may be present, and that is a feeling of thankfulness that, if these great trials were to come upon our island, there is a generation of Britons here now ready to prove itself not unworthy of the days of yore and not unworthy of those great men, the fathers of our land, who laid the foundations of our laws and shaped the greatness of our country.

This is not a question of fighting for Danzig or fighting for Poland. We are fighting to save the whole world from the pestilence of Nazi tyranny and in defence of all that is most sacred to man.

This is no war of domination or imperial aggrandizement or material gain; no war to shut any country out of its sunlight and means of progress.

It is a war, viewed in its inherent quality, to establish, on impregnable rocks, the rights of the individual, and it is a war to establish and revive the stature of man. Perhaps it might seem a paradox that a war undertaken in the name of liberty and right should require, as a necessary part of its processes, the surrender for the time being of so many of the dearly valued liberties and rights.

In these last few days, the House of Commons has been voting dozens of bills which hand over to the executive our most dearly valued traditional liberties. We are sure that these liberties will be in hands which will not abuse them, which will use them for no class or party interests, which will cherish and guard them, and we look forward to the day, surely and confidently we look forward to the day, when our liberties and rights will be restored to us, and when we shall be able to share them with the peoples to whom such blessings are unknown.

Eight months later, on May 10, 1940, Churchill became prime minister.

'We must be determined to live' – Germany on the brink of war –

By ERWIN SCHILD

Both time and place were depressing. The Schild family had shared a frugal supper with their boarders and were now looking for a space within the narrow confines of their apartment where the four of them could sit and talk.

It was the worst of times.

Each day was worse than the day before. Each day brought hardships and harassment for the Jews remaining in Cologne on this last day of August 1939.

Even more depressing was the frightening probability of imminent war. Germany was poised to invade Poland to satisfy the Nazi quest for Lebensraum, more living space for the racially superior Germans in the Polish east. France and Britain had made pledges to the Polish government: they would come to Poland's aid and prevent the Nazi takeover. There seemed to be no alternative except abject surrender to the insatiable German demands.

What would war mean for the remaining Jews in Germany? Perhaps half of German Jewry that had numbered about 550,000 when the Nazis took over six years earlier were still in Germany.

"We've got to talk," Margot had urged her parents and brother. "I can't stand it anymore. At least let us share our fears and hopes, if we have any."

Equally depressing as the times was the place: a shabby multiple dwelling that served as a "Judenhaus." Jews could no longer live among the general population and were forcibly transferred to segregated housing.

The Schild family had been comparatively lucky. Other families who had lost their homes after Kristallnacht on Nov. 9, 1938, such as the family of Dr. Viktor Speier-Holstein, were assigned to places unfit for human habitation. This faithful physician, a benefactor of the community for decades, had been evicted from his elegant old home and was living now with many other unfortunates in an old fort – a dark, damp and tomb-like space. The Schilds had also lost the comfortable house that had been their home and place of business ever since Hermann Schild had married Hetti in 1911. But at least their new house in the Maria-Hilfstrasse was livable.

In fact, the house provided Hermann and Hetti Schild, their son Kurt, age 26, and their 17-year-old daughter Margot not only a place to sleep but also a way to eke out a minimal living. Hundreds of Jewish families who had lived for generations in the towns and villages of the surrounding countryside had come to Cologne. Life in the small towns, where everyone knew everyone and had daily contact with their neighbours, had become unbearable because of the pressure of anti-Semitism, physical attacks and the determination of the local Nazis to rid their area of Jews. It was a little easier to escape into the anonymity of large cities.

All over Germany, Jews fled to larger centres

The flight of Jews from small towns was not limited to Cologne. All over Germany, Jews fled to the larger population centres. The Schild family had lost their shoe stores in a forced sale. After Kristallnacht, Jewish owners were legally forced to "aryanize" their business by selling out to an "Arier," a racially qualified Aryan German. Having lost their only source of income, the Schild family tried to operate a "pension," a kind of boarding house, for homeless newcomers to the city.

My brother Kurt and sister Margot, probably in 1938.

There was one piece of pleasant news to discuss when the family finally found a corner to sit and talk.

"Oh, we had a visitor today while you were out, Margot," Kurt informed his sister.

"A visitor? Like who? A relative? A new person without a home?"

"No, no, Margot! It was not a Jewish person. Catherine came to see us."

"Catherine? She wasn't afraid to visit a Jewish family? If a German befriends a Jew, it is considered almost like treason. You betray your own people if you fraternize with a Jew. Someone will denounce her to the local Nazi big shot, and she will be in trouble."

"We mentioned that to her, but she said she was not afraid. Nothing can change her feelings about our family.

She lived most of her life in our house, together with her brother and her parents who rented the flat from our parents. Mom and Dad became like parents to her. She was 16 when she started to work in our first shoe store. Father taught and encouraged her and eventually she became his right-hand person – managing a great part of our business.Nobody has the right to tell her, so she said, whom she can associate with. If anybody will bother her, he'll get a good piece of her mind."

"And she could do it, too," Hetti added. "She is bold, unafraid, and has a sharp and loud tongue. She also told us her brother was called up to the army. She is very conflicted about it."

"Catherine did an amazing thing, though," said Hermann. "Some customers in our former neighbourhood owe us quite a bit of money for merchandise they bought on credit and never paid. She went and collected. Can you believe that? She was playing with fire. But she knew we needed money in the worst way, and she decided to try to collect what was outstanding. She was quite successful, too. She said there would be no trouble, neither for her nor for us."

Soon, however, the mood of the conversation changed to bleak despair, as parents and children turned to discussing their present situation. The outlook was grim. One ray of hope was that Erwin, the middle child at 19, was safe in London and wrote encouraging letters and postcards to family and friends.

"If war breaks out, we won't get mail from Erwin any more," Hetti remarked. Wife and mother, Hetti was a strong-willed lady, practical and competent in an emergency. It was she who got the Gestapo, the dreaded state police, to release her husband from Dachau where he had been imprisoned after being arrested during Kristallnacht. Without him, she claimed, it was impossible to transfer the family business to the new owner, and in Nazi Germany even expropriation had to be legally correct

My great grandparents Baruch Loeb and Hindel Schild, about 1870.

In similar fashion it was her letter of appeal to the secret police that resulted in Erwin's release from Dachau.

"There is no postal service between countries at war," she explained to Margot.

"Well," said Margot, "as long as Holland remains neutral, Erwin can write to Uncle Willie in Amsterdam, and he will forward his letters on to us."

For a moment it was quiet and you could hear an almost whispered sigh from Mother. Kurt broke the silence. "I am supposed to get my visa for the United States in a few months, as soon as my waiting number comes up in Stuttgart. How will I get to America if there is a war?"

Stuttgart was the great portal of hope. The American consulate in that major city in southern Germany was the place where prospective immigrants who had complied with all the necessary requirements, such as an affidavit of sponsorship and financial responsibility for the immigrant by an American citizen, would finally have their passport stamped with the seal of life: the American visa.

In 1939, every Jew left in Germany was desperate to emigrate. The Nazi regime did not put obstacles in the way of Jews who were able to leave, although regulations as to what they were allowed to take with them became progressively more brutal. On the contrary, in January 1939, the Nazi regime had established a central agency for Jewish emigration administered under the authority of the dreaded Reinhard Heydrich.

Statistics showed that 68,000 Jews managed to emigrate in 1939, more than the 49,000 who left Germany the year before, despite the increasingly difficult regulations that prevented migration from Germany to other European countries, to Palestine and to most countries on the American continent. As for Canada, none was too many when it came to Jewish refugees.

The United States, the preferred place of refuge, had refused to budge from its outmoded quota system. The U.S. had assigned to each country of origin a quota for admissible immigrants. Under this system, about 50,000 German-born individuals were eligible to enter each year. Even if it doomed thousands of qualified persons to death, that immigration quota was unchangeable, not subject even to temporary amendments such as borrowing from future years' quotas to rescue Jews from impending disaster. Jews remaining in Germany who had any hope that they might persuade or beg a friend or relative in the U.S. to sponsor them, registered their names with the Stuttgart consulate and were placed on a waiting list. The hope was that by the time their number would be called, a benefactor might have been found to sponsor their entry to America

My uncle Julius Schild in fatigues. He was killed in World War I.

Jewish people were comparing their numbers, envious of those whose number was lower, and trying to estimate when their turn would come in this macabre lottery of death. Desperate Jews knocked in vain at the gates of other countries. For a few days after Kristallnacht, countries that shared borders with Germany had admitted some Jews fleeing the violence, but soon the doors were shut tight again.

Now it was soon to be Kurt's turn. A distant relative had agreed to sponsor him, and all he needed now was time to wait for the call from Stuttgart. Now that war seemed inevitable, however, his hopes might collapse.

Hermann Schild was despondent. As the father, he blamed himself for not having started years before to prepare a refuge abroad for his family. He had not been able to imagine that Jews, German citizens, born and raised in the Vaterland, could be persecuted by their own government. His imprisonment in Dachau after Kristallnacht had taught him the depravity of which the Nazi regime, supported by the majority of German citizens, was capable.

"Perhaps if war breaks out, the Nazis may need us to work in factories," Margot ventured. She still had a place to work in the office of a Jewish clothing manufacturer who had managed to keep operating. Jews were still allowed to work for fellow Jews and to do business within their own community, but were excluded from commerce with Aryan Germans.

My uncle Felix Schild in dress uniform, from World War I.

There was no mistaking the Nazi plan for Jews

"On the contrary," said Kurt. "If war comes, the Nazis will have no restraints at all. They never respected world opinion before, but if there is war, they can do anything they want."

Kurt, like other Jews, had not forgotten Hitler's address on Jan. 30, 1939, the sixth anniversary of the "Machtergreifung," the seizure of power by the Nazi party and Hitler becoming the chancellor of the German Reich.

This is what Hitler had said: "And one thing I would like to express on this memorable day, memorable perhaps not only for us Germans. During my life, I have very often been a prophet and was laughed at most of the time. During the time of my struggle for power, it was primarily the Jewish people who reacted only with laughter to my prophesies that one day I would take over the leadership of the State and thus of all the people in Germany and then would also provide a solution to the Jewish problem... I believe that the resounding laughter of the past has probably stuck in their throats by now.

'Who knows what else is in store for us?'

"Today, I want to be a prophet again: if international financial Jewry, both inside and outside of Europe, should succeed in plunging the nations into a world war once again, then the result will not be the Bolshivization of the world and thus the victory of the Jews, but the extermination of the Jewish race in Europe."

The extermination of the Jewish race in Europe. There was no mistaking the Nazi plan for Jews.

"You know what I think?" said Hermann Schild with quiet emphasis. He had lived through the war of 1914-1918. He had served in the German army like his two brothers, one of whom had fallen, and he had experienced the defeat of Germany and its allies. "France and Britain are too strong for Germany. The Nazis have been misled by their own propaganda. They believe in their superiority. They were encouraged by their easy success last year when they took over Austria and made it part of the German Reich. They were allowed to swallow Czechoslovakia after Hitler had assured Chamberlain at their meeting in Munich a few months ago that Germany only demanded the German-speaking borderlands.

"Despite his assurance that Germany has no further territorial aspirations, they thumb their nose at the Allies and are set to occupy Poland. They have forgotten the lessons of the war. A war with France and England will be the end of the Nazi government. We may have to endure some horrible times, but better an end with terror than a terror without end.

"Let the end come. Right now our existence is a terror without end. After the horror of Kristallnacht, the government imposed a heavy fine on us, the victims, the Jews of Germany – one billion marks! It is a burden too heavy for our communities to bear. It had to be squeezed out of Jewish citizens whose means of livelihood had been taken away.

"New regulations have eliminated Jews from the German economy; we have all become beggars. Mother and I had to sign over our shoe stores to an Aryan buyer for practically nothing. We had to pay for the repairs of damages to our property, like all the owners of shops and offices that were vandalized during the pogrom night. Oh, we were covered by insurance, but the insurance companies were compelled to pay their clients' claims to the government treasury, not to the poor souls who had suffered the damage. So we lost our two stores, had to pay for the repairs to the property that was no longer ours, and the government pocketed our insurance money. That was our punishment for surviving the pogrom night.

"Erwin and I were lucky to get out of Dachau, but what have we got now? We live in misery. Our synagogues are in ashes. The community organization that was to represent us vis-à-vis the authorities, the 'Reichsvertretung,' the 'Representatives of the Jews in Germany,' has been dissolved. Instead, we had to set up what they call the Reichsvereinigung, the federal association of the Jews of Germany, which is controlled by the interior ministry and cannot act independently. The government holds the leaders responsible for the enforcement of every anti-Jewish decree and regulation. It mainly helped the Nazis to get rid of as many Jews as possible through emigration. I know a family that got permits to emigrate to Paraguay in South America. Like many others who have lost their livelihood, they have no money to buy their tickets. Now the Nazis demand that our new Vereinigung has to come up with the money, or else.

"Jewish children have been expelled from all German schools. Our impoverished community has to arrange for their education with money they don't have. Our Erwin was probably among the last Jewish students to graduate from a German high school.

"With the exception of the Jewish Kulturbund and the Palestine office of the Zionist organization, all Jewish clubs and organizations have been dissolved. All Jewish newspapers and magazines have been shut down. Is that not terror without end? I've heard rumours about new decrees that will be enforced when war breaks out: a curfew prohibiting Jews to leave their home after dark. Jews prohibited from public transportation. Our food rations will be cut, and there will be only a few hours during which Jews can shop for groceries, probably when the store shelves will be empty. Who knows what else is in store for us?"

Mother had started to cry softly. "Let's hope you will get out, Kurt," she sobbed. "And try to look after our Erwin. He is still only a boy. God only knows what will happen to him if war breaks out. If you get out of here, you two will be the only hope for our family."

"If I get to America," Kurt stood up as if he was taking an oath, "I will tell the world what is happening here."

"Quiet, Kurt. The walls have ears," father said. "And even if you get to America, don't forget that we are still here, hostages to the Nazis. Your words, written or spoken, may be dangerous for us."

The house was dark and quiet. Most residents had tried to find the solace of sleep. Margot had the last word. She had been deeply influenced by a rabbi who had remained in Cologne, Dr. Sigmund Stein. He was an educator and had a considerable following among the religious youth in the community.

"'The night is darkest just before dawn breaks,' our sages observed. Perhaps this is our darkest hour. We must be determined to live, no matter what. And if we dedicate our poor lives to HaShem, He will protect us, I am sure. Let's say our night prayers and close with: 'To Your hands I entrust my soul, whether I sleep or am awake; and with my soul my body, too; the Lord is with me, I have no fear.'"

Kurt Schild was able to leave Germany and arrived in the United States in April 1940. He served in the American army.

Hermann and Hetti Schild perished in the ghetto of Riga.

Margot survived the Holocaust in Europe. She joined her brother Kurt after the war and was reunited with her brother Erwin on her first visit to Toronto.

Erwin Schild is rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation in Toronto. His autobiography, The Very Narrow Bridge, was published by Malcolm Lester and Adath Israel Congregation. His new book And Miles to Go Before I Sleep was to be launched on Sept. 15.

Wartime memories in Cheltenham Spa

By DONALD CARR

The town of Cheltenham Spa is nestled at the western edge of the Cotswold Hills, some 100 miles west of London. Known as "The Garden Town of England," it was well known for its medicinal waters, beautiful gardens and retired colonels. The latter could be seen, wheeled in their bath chairs down the Promenade from the Queens Hotel, past the beautiful Regency buildings, to "take the waters."

In 1939, out of a population of 25,000, there were five Jewish families. My family – my father, mother, two sisters and I — was one of them.

There was a synagogue which was consecrated in 1839. Apparently there had been a flourishing Jewish community for some 60 years. However, as the community shrank and disappeared, the synagogue closed in 1903. It remained closed until 1941. Most of its contents, including the seating and the reproduction of the traditional prayer for the Royal Family on a large gilt plaque that hung on the wall, dated to 1727 during the reign of King George II, were gifts from the New Synagogue in London, after it closed in the early 1800s.

Kosher meat, packed in dry ice, came by train from Birmingham every week. As with most people, we had neither a refrigerator nor an ice box. We had a "larder" off the kitchen, with a stone slab shelf to keep foods cool. While my mother cooked most of the meat shortly after we received it, the larder stood us in good stead until the subsequent delivery of meat. It was hardly the most efficient preserver of food, however. After every thunderstorm, I would see the inevitable cheesecloth bag filled with curdled milk, hanging from the taps in the sink as my mother made cottage cheese.

My father, born in England but brought up in Toronto, joined the Canadian Army in 1916. He was posted to England. There he met my mother and became a "reverse war bride."

They first lived in Leeds, Yorkshire. It was a major centre of the clothing industry with the largest percentage of Jews relative to the general population of any city in Great Britain and was dubbed "the Holy City" by many non-Jews.

My father had been a tailor in Toronto (between bouts of being a commercial traveller, selling "Melichrino" cigars, he told me). He became manager of a plant belonging to Britain's largest clothing chain, Burton's, itself owned by a Jewish family.

When, in 1937, he was offered a position as general manager of a well known West of England clothing factory in the little town of Stroud in Gloucestershire, the family moved to Cheltenham, some 15 miles away.

I first attended a "one-room schoolhouse." It was called, grandly, Corinth College. It was a private Jewish school for boys, founded by Daniel L. Lipson, the former mayor of Cheltenham and then its independent member of Parliament. He was housemaster of the Jewish house, Corinth House, at the famous "public" school, Cheltenham College.

When Cheltenham College closed Corinth House, Lipson took the students and created Corinth College in a large house nearby where he and his family lived. There might have been a dozen students, all told. I was by far the youngest. Most of the students were from mainland Europe. We wore grey shorts, a school blazer and a mortarboard (with a purple tassel). It closed in about a year or two, and then I went to an elementary public school.

Corinth House is now a government daycare centre for some 60 children.

It was my father who taught me the "aleph-bais" so that I could read a siddur and a Chumash. However, as bar mitzvah was not far away, he sought out a melamed (Hebrew teacher) who lived in a nearby village.

Every Sunday morning, a friend about the same age and I were driven to the melamed's home. My father and the father of my fellow student took turns each week driving us to the melamed, waiting while we took our lesson and then driving us home.

I recall, vividly, Sunday morning, Sept. 3, 1939.

We were in my father's car on the way to our teacher. The radio was on, and the program was interrupted by the sonorous tone of Alvar Liddell, BBC's regular news reader, as he introduced the prime minister, Neville Chamberlain.

'Fresh fruit, vegetables and all imports were almost impossible to find'

In his high-pitched, grating voice, Chamberlain announced that Great Britain was at war with Germany, which had invaded Poland two days earlier. Gone was the declaration he had made of "peace in our time," as he stepped off the plane from Germany just one year earlier.

Chamberlain had waved a piece of paper that he identified as an agreement solemnly signed by him and "Herr Hitler," who, by the way, had "no further territorial claims in Europe," he assured the world.

Gone were the days of innocence.

In a period of several months of quiet, called the "Phoney War," we were all issued gas masks. They were horrible, rubber-smelling contraptions which we had to don in school in weekly emergency drills. Mother had to put up blackout drapes on every window and the family engaged in "decorating" every pane of glass with criss-crossed sticky tape to prevent shards of glass from injuring anyone in the house if there was an air raid. Rationing of food began. Fresh fruit, vegetables and all imports were almost impossible to find.

Carr inspects the rifle of a Company Sergeant in a platoon of army cadets.

At that time, Cheltenham was generally regarded as a "protected area." It was thought the Luftwaffe would not pay any attention to a town which ostensibly had no war industry. Bristol, some 50 miles to the south and Birmingham and Nottingham, some 50 to 70 miles to the north, had large manufacturing plants and produced munitions. They were sure targets for the Germans.

Because of that general attitude, I suppose, Cheltenham became a host to a multitude of evacuees from London. Among them were many Jews. So, too, the RCAF established its records office on the outskirts of town. Later the U.S. Army Services of Supply for Europe made its headquarters in Cheltenham. Those units had several Jewish servicemen and women.

This influx warranted the opening of the synagogue and the hiring of a "minister." At that time in Britain there was a dearth of ordained rabbis. Jews College in London, the main British seminary, graduated rabbis. The late Rabbi Harold Lerner of Pride of Israel Congregation in Toronto was one of them.

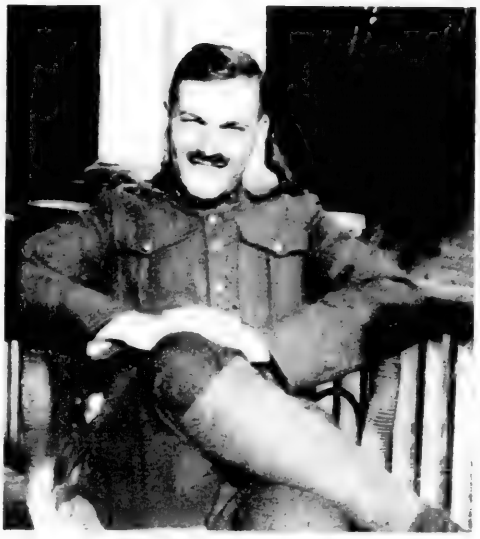
'Almost every night, the sirens wailed'



The author's father, Harry Carr

However, it also graduated "ministers." Trained as chazzanim and shochtim, they were retained by smaller congregations to substitute for a rabbi. Imitating Protestant ministers, they wore the traditional "dog collar" and were addressed as "Reverend."

One of those ministers, Cyril Braslavsky, came to Cheltenham to conduct services. There was now a minyan for Shabbat and the yamim tovim. Indeed, for the High Holidays, there was even an overflow minyan in a rented hall. My father, by then the secretary of Cheltenham Hebrew Congregation, oversaw the "overflow minyan" and acted as the head usher in the crowded hall.

He and I were the only kohanim in the congregation. Consequently, after my bar mitzvah, it was either he or I who had the kohen aliyah and because we also did not have a Levi we always had the second aliyah!

Almost every night after the months of the Phoney War, the "alert" sirens wailed and we heard the distinctive engines of the German bombers as they passed overhead on their way to Birmingham or Coventry. The sky was lit up by dozens of roving searchlights reflecting against the clouds as they sought out an enemy target – and rarely found one. The thunder of anti-aircraft artillery and showers of pieces of spent shrapnel followed. In the morning, we schoolchildren played the game of seeing who could collect the most pieces of shrapnel that littered the roads, the sidewalks and the gardens.

Some men over the age of conscription joined the Home Guard, a motley khaki-uniformed crew. They were issued pikes or World War I vintage Lee-Enfield rifles and learned how to march and salute. Others became air raid wardens, ready to usher the populace into bomb shelters and to help those unable to make it to a shelter by themselves.

'After my 18th birthday, I was called up into the army'

My father became an auxiliary policeman. He was issued a blue "tin helmet," a black and white armband and a truncheon. As soon as we heard the wail of the siren, every time the bombers were overhead, he had to leave the house and go on patrol. His responsibility in our area was to ensure that no lights could be seen from the houses and that no inappropriate acts were undertaken by the populace. It was my delight – when he was not home – to put on his armband and helmet, carry his truncheon and strut around the back garden, playing with my friends.

Within what seemed like days after we heard that the war had started, we all began to listen to English radio broadcasts from Germany. Although this was illegal, it seemed that everyone wanted to listen to the "news" read by "Lord Haw Haw" – the nickname for a British traitor, William Joyce.

Formerly a member of Sir Oswald Mosley's fascist "Blackshirts," Joyce had escaped arrest and fled to Germany immediately after war was declared. Virulently anti-Semitic, constantly blaming the war on the Jews, he announced his nightly broadcast in his nasal voice, with what sounded like "Jarmany calling! Jarmany calling!"

Interspersed among his ravings regarding the cause of the war – the Jews, of course – it was uncanny how he had pieces of actual news of what was happening in Britain. His audience in Britain was reckoned to be at least as large as that of the BBC. However, he never succeeded in his intended aim of breaking the spirit of the British. He was treated as a comedian. After the war, he was captured, tried for treason and hanged.

Despite the hope that Cheltenham would be spared from bombing, it later sustained daylight and nighttime air raids. Incendiary bombs fell in our garden, but there was no damage to our house.

I recall one afternoon, fairly early in the war, standing at a second floor front window in our house. The sirens sounded and I looked up at the sky. I was almost transfixed as I saw a Dornier 17 aircraft drop from the grey clouds, perhaps a mile away. As if in slow motion, it crossed my view, from left to right, and I saw distinctly its bomb doors open and three bombs fall onto some part of the town, beyond my view. Three explosions followed. I never did find where the bombs had fallen.

In 1944, I joined the Army Cadet Force, the First Battalion of the infantry Gloucestershire Regiment, and rose to the position of its regimental sergeant major. I taught aircraft recognition to several U.S. army units stationed in Cheltenham. I remember V-Day, when I was in a camp in nearby Cranham Woods and we celebrated almost all night.

I joined the Federation of Zionist Youth (FZY), the umbrella organization of all the British Zionist youth groups, from Hashomer Hatza'ir on the left to Bachad (Brit Chalutz Dati'im) on the right. My former teacher, Daniel Lipson, an avowed anti-Zionist, went so far as to prevent a planned Sunday evening FZY dance with members from Bristol and Birmingham because it breached some Day of Rest bylaw!

A few days after my 18th birthday after the war, I was called up into the army. Although destined for Burma, I was diverted to the Foreign Office (German Section) Military Branch in London.

My army service of some 2-1/2 years was "without tears." While serving, a friend and I published a monthly magazine, Young Israel, the organ of the FZY. Our first article, specially written for the publication, was by one Aubrey Stone – later Abba Eban – then the representative of the Jewish Agency in London.

On demobilization in 1948, instead of making aliyah, I immigrated to Canada, where my father's brothers, sisters, nephews and nieces had remained.

The Jewish population of Britain in 1939 was 340,000. London, Leeds, Manchester and Glasgow had the largest numbers. Many towns across the country had active congregations.

These numbers swelled to some 400,000 after the war, with the arrival of refugees from mainland Europe. Today, some 280,000 Jews live in Britain.

Jews are dispersed across the country. Leeds, once the proud centre, no longer has even one kosher restaurant. Manchester and London still flourish. Those communities see more and more haredi members. Cheltenham, where I was raised, has about 70 Jews out of a general population of 11,000. But the synagogue still remains open.

Perhaps ironically, although it is in keeping with almost the whole of Europe, the Muslim community has increased by leaps and bounds. Overt anti-Semitism has reached heights – or I should say, depths – never before imagined.

Donald Carr, Q.C., a lawyer in Toronto and a longtime activist on behalf of the Jewish community, is president of The Canadian Jewish News.

French child survivor remembers life before Vichy gov't

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

"We used to wonder where war lived, what it was that made it so vile. And now we realize that we know where it lives... inside ourselves." — Albert Camus

For the nearly 150,000 Jews of Paris, prior to the outbreak of the World War II and the occupation of France by Nazi Germany, life went on much as it had for decades.

Generally speaking, secular and Orthodox Jews, and everyone in between, went about their business and personal affairs as most other Parisians; experiencing both the lows and highs of life, the ennui and the joie de vivre.

For Albert Stal, a young Jewish boy growing up on the second floor of 33 Rue Vandrezanne in the 13th arondissement (administrative district) of Paris – located on the left bank of the Seine River – life in pre-war France was for the most part normal and happy.

Speaking with a gentle French lilt, Stal recalled how he was born into a secular Jewish family. His father, Yisroel Mendel Stal, was a self-employed furniture maker, and his mother, Liba Nachal, was a homemaker. He was the oldest of three children – his brother Salomon (Simon) was two years his junior and baby sister Marguerite (Margot) – and remembered doing all the normal things children did at the time.

"I used to play soccer in the street with friends and we'd play in the park and run to a fountain nearby," he said, a wry smile playing across his lips.

For many Jews, France represented a place of rebirth and renewal after years of enduring anti-Semitic and harsh conditions in Eastern Europe and elsewhere.

According to the Jewish Virtual Library the period between World War I and II witnessed Jewish immigration from North Africa, Turkey and Greece increase. "Immigration from Eastern Europe also skyrocketed, many came after the pogroms in the Ukraine and Poland. The trend continued especially after the United States prohibited free immigration in 1924.

"The Federation des Societes Juif de France (FSJF) was established in 1923 to take care of the needs of the French Jewish community."

French Jewish artists such as Modigliani, Soutine, Kisling, Pisarro and Chagall were also renowned for their artwork and contributions to French culture.

Stal remembers enjoying visits to the library, where he could indulge in his love of reading. Something he said he retains to this day.

"I used to read Victor Hugo, Alexandre Dumas, and [Jean] Racine. My father used to [subscribe] to a newspaper and every week it would have a new chapter of John Steinbeck's Les Raisins de la colère (The Grapes of Wrath)," he said. "That's where I first read it."

He attended kindergarten, primary school and had started "commercial" schooling to learn bookkeeping as a trade before his education – and life as he knew it – was cut short due to the Nazi occupation of France in June 1940, and the subsequent deportation of Jews to the concentration camps aided by the complicity of Marshal Phillipe Pétain's Vichy régime.

Prior to that turning point, Stal's early childhood memories are of what most children remember: their parents and home, he said.

Albert Stal, age 11, circa 1938.

World should not forget the French children

"A man's hands betray his secrets and my father's were rough and strong," Stal said, describing his father, adding that he remembers how he would often accompany his father to work on the métro (subway) and remarking that the workshop was "sparsely furnished... he did not like cluttering with unnecessary objects."

Stal admitted that at the age of 7 or 8 he didn't like having to go with his dad to work – Mendel would often require him to handle metal, which was tough on his little hands, he said – but that this usually only happened on Thursdays, when his school would be closed.

"My father's operation was a small business, but by sheer determination he always managed to scrape monies to carry on and provide subsistence to his family."

Of his mother, Stal said she "was a sensitive woman with a quick mind and easy smile, a devoted wife and homemaker. She was indefatigable, cooking, washing and mending while raising three children... and prided herself on her generosity to others."

Stal said he shared a room with Simon while his sister Margot, a baby at the time, slept in his parents' bedroom.

Speaking about his pre-Shoah family life brought tears to Stal's eyes, as he recalled how his family was broken apart, his parents and brother taken away, leaving him at the age of 15 to be his sister's sole guardian.

But those are details are for another story, he said, attempting to stay with the theme of his life in pre-war France.

As war inched ever closer to the country, Stal said he remembers various Jewish worker and civil servant protests, with strikers "trapped in conflicting loyalties and emotions."

Through the prism of his father's daily ruminations on the state of French society, Stal said as a child he remembered thinking "that the country was in financial crisis. It was getting harder every day. Poverty and social issues were prevalent. Every direction led to new troubles."

A letter dated Oct. 7, 1935 written by his father in broken English to an uncle in Canada, expresses the elder Stal's concerns about what fate might befall the Jews of Paris in the coming years.

"The business is going very badly. No one is working. While all this means that we must run away as the war is at the doorstep."

Mendel continues: "... everyone is wandering around as if asleep. You cannot imagine how bad it has become in Paris. We do not know which world we are in, dear brother."

While his father took stock of the shifting political landscape, Stal remained relatively sheltered from the global upheaval that surrounded his youth

"I would be playing that old game, with the stick and hoop. I would go see movies, which cost five centimes, at the local theatre," he said, smiling. "I would see Tarzan and westerns... and sneak in on Saturday afternoons."

Stal said he remembers that his building on Rue Vandrezanne housed many Jewish families that all came from the same shtetl his parents came from, in Szydlowiec, Poland. His parents arrived in France around 1926.

As far as dealings with non-Jews, Stal said his family got along relatively well with their neighbours before the war, but remembers that his parents could not obtain French citizenship, whereas even though he was born in Paris, he was not considered French until his parents applied for naturalization for their children.

For his part, he remembers occasionally being called "sale juif" (dirty Jew) and being told to "go back to Palestine" by gentile children his age. But this was the exception, not the rule for most of his pre-teen years.

"Most of my friends were Jewish and I was [happy] going to kindergarten and elementary school, which was on the same street where we lived," he said.

While reminiscing about his childhood and the era before his life descended into the nightmare realm of premature orphanhood, Stal wished it known that the world should not forget those French children who laughed, played and got into mischief with him before succumbing to their dark destinies at the hands of the Nazis.

Approximately 76,000 French Jews were sent to concentration camps, including some 11,000 children.

"All those children could have been the spine and the backbone of unlimited richness to France," Stal wrote to The CJN in a letter after his interview. "A generation of scientists, engineers and technologists that will never tell stories. They all will remain silent. We will never forget and we shall make them known to the sons and daughters of future generations."

After the Holocaust, Albert and Margot Stal came to Canada to stay with three uncles. Albert became a chartered accountant. He is semi-retired and lives in Toronto with his wife, Eva.

Nazi influence extended beyond Europe

By RABBI MARC D. ANGEL

The Nazi menace that decimated European Jewry reached even to North Africa and the Middle East. Jews of all backgrounds were victimized, and many stories about murdered family members remain as the heritage of Jews throughout the world. In our family – whose roots were in the Sephardi community of the Greek Island of Rhodes – we also have a story.

My grandfather, Bohor Yehuda Angel, left the Island of Rhodes in 1908 to settle in Seattle, Wash. He and his older two sons, Moshe and Ralph, worked tirelessly to save enough money to bring the rest of the family to Seattle – my grandmother, Bulissa Esther Angel and the children: Victoria, Luna, Abner, Joseph and Rahamim.

During the early 20th century, the Jewish community of Rhodes numbered about 5,000. They formed a classic Judeo-Spanish Sephardi enclave, with an impressive cadre of rabbinic scholars, businesspeople and intellectuals. The masses of Sephardim, though, were poor, and many began to consider leaving Rhodes to improve their lots. The favoured destination was the United States, with others leaving for Rhodesia and the Congo, Europe and Israel.

It took three years for my grandfather and uncles to save enough money to bring the rest of the family to Seattle. In 1911, my grandmother set sail with her five children, eager to be reunited with her husband and older sons. When their ship arrived in New York Harbour, they were confronted by United States immigration officials. It turned out that Joseph, about eight years old, had a scalp infection known as tinias. The immigration officials told my grandmother they would not admit Joseph into the U.S. My grandmother pleaded with them, but to no avail.

What was she to do? It had taken three years of hard work for my grandfather to earn enough to bring the family to Seattle. If she returned to Rhodes now, how many more years would be needed to arrange for new tickets? But how could she bear sending little Joseph back to Rhodes by himself? As it happened, another Jew from Rhodes was not admitted into the United States. He volunteered to bring Joseph back to Rhodes to live with relatives until such a time as he could be brought to Seattle to join the rest of his family. My grandmother had no real choice: she agreed to send Joseph back to Rhodes. She looked forward to the day when he would come to Seattle.

Joseph never did make it back. He grew up in Rhodes, and was married in the late 1920s to Sinyoru Angel (not related). They had four children – a son and daughter were named Yehuda Leon and Bulissa, after Joseph's parents; the other son and daughter were named Jacob and Sara, after Sinyoru's parents.

My father, Victor Angel, who was born in Seattle, never met his brother Joseph or Joseph's family.

The Jews of Rhodes lived under the rule of the Ottoman Empire from 1522 until 1912, when Italian forces occupied the island. Italy officially took control of Rhodes in 1923 with the Treaty of Lausanne. When Italy aligned with Germany in June 1936, the Jewish community of Rhodes began to feel the bitter stings of government-sponsored anti-Semitism. The highly regarded Rabbinical College of Rhodes was forced to close. Jews were required to keep their stores open on Saturdays and Jewish holidays. In September 1938, anti-Jewish laws were announced: ritual slaughter of animals was prohibited; Jews could not buy property, employ non-Jewish servants or send their children to government schools. Non-Jews were not allowed to patronize Jewish doctors or pharmacists. Jews who had settled in Rhodes after 1919 were ordered to leave.

By September 1939, the Jewish community of Rhodes had shrunk to fewer than 2,000 people. Those who remained faced ongoing discriminatory laws. Uncle Joseph and his family must have suffered and worried very much about their future.

Jews of Rhodes were oppressed

In May 1939 the boat seen in this photo stopped in Rhodes en route to Palestine from Prague carrying about 600 Jews. Several young Jews from Rhodes joined the refugees. But before the vessel had traveled far from Rhodes a fire broke out on board. The passengers safely reached the Island of Samos and returned to Rhodes where the Jewish community managed to find another ship enabling all the refugees to sail for Palestine.

The anguish only grew with each passing year. In early 1944, Uncle Joseph died – we don't know the cause, although we can surmise that fear and anxiety played their roles in his early death. In August 1944, German troops took control of Rhodes. In short order, the historic Jewish community of Rhodes came to a tragic end. Almost all the Jews were deported to Auschwitz, and only about 150 survived. Among the victims were my Aunt Sinyoru and my cousins Yehudah Leon, Jacob, Bulissa and Sara – people I would never meet, but whose memory would never leave me.

Little Joseph had been turned away from the United States by an immigration official. That official did not realize that his action ultimately was a death sentence for Joseph's family. Had he been allowed to go to Seattle, he, like the rest of his siblings, would have lived. Perhaps a kinder official would have taken pity on my grandmother and her children, and perhaps this story would have had a happier ending.

In 1939, the Jews of Rhodes were oppressed by anti-Semitic rulers, but few imagined that the Nazi deportations and concentration camps would include them. This situation prevailed in other Sephardi communities as well.

Mr. Isaac Gerson, now aged 96, was a merchant in Salonika in 1939. Salonika was one of the crown jewels of the Sephardi world, a bastion of Judeo-Spanish civilization. Gerson recalls that in 1939 the Jews were confused; they heard rumours about Nazi Germany, but could not believe that the "civilized" Germans could become vile murderers. Few Jews fled Salonika. Jewish leaders did not foresee the coming disaster, and did not encourage flight or active resistance on the part of the Jews. The approximately 50,000 Jews of Salonika began to recognize the gravity of their situation in April 1941, when the Germans occupied Greece. In March 1943, the Nazis deported the Jews to concentration camps. Few survived.

In 1939, Thea Gomes de Mesquita was a young girl growing up in the Sephardi community of Amsterdam. She had no premonition of danger. The family attended synagogue as usual; she attended the talmud torah as usual. Yet the adults of the community must have sensed trouble. German Jews, fleeing the Nazis, sought safety in Amsterdam. They told their stories of woe to the local Dutch Jews. In 1939, though, the stories did not seem immediately threatening to the Jews of Amsterdam. With the German invasion in 1940, everything changed for the worse.

Anti-Jewish restrictions went into effect. In 1941, Jews were deported to concentration camps. Gomes de Mesquita's family went into hiding and ultimately survived the war. Yet the vast majority of Amsterdam's Sephardim – along with the rest of Dutch Jewry – were murdered by the Nazis and their accomplices.

When Mussolini came to power in 1922, Silvano Arieti was a fourth-grade pupil in a non-Jewish school in Pisa, Italy. The little Jewish boy – along with his teacher and classmates – were swept up with enthusiasm for their new leader who would bring Italy to glory. Arieti even wrote a poem in honour of Mussolini. As he grew older, he came to learn that Mussolini was the personification of fascism – a tyrant and a war-monger. A fascist slogan was The Duce is always right.

In 1938, Mussolini, to strengthen Italy's alliance with Germany, declared that Italy would adopt anti-Jewish laws. Arieti, seeing the writing on the wall, fled Italy for the United States and went on to become a world-renowned psychiatrist and author. Of the approximately 50,000 Jews in Italy, 8,000 lost their lives in the Holocaust. That most Italian Jews survived the war is attributed to the generally good relations that existed between the Jews and Christians in Italy, even during the war years.

In 1939, Jewish communities in French North Africa – Algeria, Morocco and Tunisia – began to feel the claws of Nazism. The Jews in Italian Libya likewise came under anti-Jewish legislation. Thousands of North African Jews were among the innocent victims that were murdered during the Holocaust.

The Jews of Turkey and Bulgaria, though living in a state of anxiety and fear, were essentially spared deportation and murder. To the extent possible, they maintained their historic communities according to the traditions of the Judeo-Spanish Sephardim.

In 1939, Sephardi communities in Europe were living in the shadow of death, although few realized it at the time. Sephardi communities in the Middle East and North Africa – though less endangered than their European co-religionists – did not escape the brutalities of Nazism.

In 1939, Rabbi Benzion Uziel became the Sephardi Chief Rabbi of Israel. He struggled mightily to save as many Jews as possible by arranging for them to come to Palestine. The Grand Mufti of Palestine was a vicious anti-Semite, and strove to stir up anti-Jewish sentiment among the Arabs. The British sharply limited the number of Jews who could enter Israel legally.

Rabbi Benzion Uziel

In 1939 Jews throughout the world began to understand that their lives meant very little to the nations of the world, and that they could depend on few people to help them. The blind hatred aimed toward them would lead to the deaths of millions of individuals and the destruction of countless communities.

After the war, Rabbi Uziel was asked how Jews should memorialize those who died in the Holocaust. His answer was powerful: we must defy the Nazis and their collaborators who attempted to destroy Jews and Jewish civilization. We can best memorialize the Jewish victims by building synagogues and Torah academies named after the Jewish communities that were wiped out. We will create new, vital Jewish life. We will raise new generations of pious, learned and dedicated Jews. We will grow and flourish, and will never forget those Jews who lost their lives in the Holocaust. The Jewish people will live, and the souls of the departed will live on through the new Jewish generations.

Uncle Joseph and family would be pleased to know that they are remembered, that they have relatives who cherish their memory and who live according to the teachings and ideals of Judaism. Am Yisrael Chai. Od Avinu Chai: the people of Israel lives, our God lives.

Rabbi Angel is founder and director of the Institute for Jewish Ideas and Ideals (jewishideas.org), and rabbi emeritus of Congregation Shearith Israel, the historic Spanish and Portuguese Synagogue of New York City. He is the author and editor of 27 books, many of them dealing with Sephardi history and culture.

Poland: largest community in Europe

By ANTONY POLONSKY

On the eve of World War II, Poland contained the largest Jewish community in Europe. With its population of nearly 3 1/2 million, Polish Jewry still retained its position as one of the main centres of the Jewish world.

It was a Jewry with a long and distinguished history. By the middle of the 18th century, on the lands that had made up the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth, a Jewish community had established itself. Its population had reached more than 750,000 people and contained at least one third of the Jews in the world. This community had prospered as a result of a marriage of convenience with the Polish nobility, which dominated pre-partition Poland and which enabled the Jews – in spite of outbreaks of anti-Jewish violence, such as those that accompanied the crisis of the Polish state in the middle of the 17th century – to flourish both economically and spiritually.

Jews were allowed to participate in a wide range of trades, crafts and skills and very frequently managed the estates of the nobility. They were the indispensable craftsmen of the rural economy in the villages and small towns (shtetlach) – the carpenters, cobblers, blacksmiths, tailors, tarmakers, wheelwrights – a position which was unique in Europe.

Jewish religious and intellectual life also developed richly. The yeshivot of Poland became the models for talmudic study for the rest of Europe while Polish masters of Halachah became the dominant influence in the religious life of the Jewish world. Kabbalistic study was transformed in Poland from the domain of a small aristocratic elite into a mass movement and it was on the Polish lands that Chassidism, the last mass Jewish religious movement to establish itself in the Jewish world, emerged and flourished.

The situation of the Jews had begun to deteriorate already in the middle of the 17th century, as the Polish-Lithuanian Commonwealth itself began to decline. Yet the community managed to maintain itself and even expand in the 18th century, in spite of growing obscurantism. From the middle of that century, the Jews had come under increasing pressure, first from the Polish reformers whose influence was greatly strengthened by the first partition of Poland in 1772, and then from the governments that partitioned Poland at the end of the century to transform themselves from a community linked by a common religious tradition and way of life and transcending national boundaries, into citizens of the country in which they lived.

This was a process to which Jews were subjected in all the areas of Europe, and it proved relatively successful in the western and central parts of the continent, where, in the course of the 19th century, the Jews were transformed into Englishman, Frenchman and even Germans "of the Hebrew faith." Because of the size of the Jewish population on the Polish lands, its resistance to the sort of transformation proposed and the growth of anti-Jewish sentiment, by the late 19th century, the "assimilationists," whether Polish or Jewish, who sought to make the Jews into "Poles of the Mosaic faith" largely failed in their efforts.

A minority of Polish Jews, both in Galicia (Austrian Poland) and in the Kingdom of Poland (whose autonomy was established at the Congress of Vienna), accepted the assimilationist dream, linked as it was with political liberalism, and were fairly well integrated into Polish society. But in the parts of Poland that had been directly absorbed into the Tsarist Empire (the Pale of Settlement) and where the majority of Jews from the former Polish Republic lived, the Maskilic elite favoured Russification rather than Polonization. In all these areas, and particularly in the Pale of Settlement, the late 19th century saw the emergence and increasing dominance of autonomist concepts of Jewish self-identification, in particular Zionism and Jewish autonomist socialism (Bundism).

Modernized versions of traditional Orthodoxy also developed a significant following, both Mitnagdic and Chassidic. A significant minority within the Jewish community was attracted to revolutionary socialism with its vision of a new world, in which the old divisions of Jew and gentile would be subsumed by the creation of a new socialist humanity. Along with the development of these new ideologies, there occurred the emergence of Yiddish as a literary language and the development of modern Hebrew. These developments greatly complicated the issue of how to ensure equal rights for the Jews in Poland, since what was being demanded was not only individual equality before the law, but recognition of group separateness, in a society committed to pluralism.

As a consequence, Polish-Jewish relations, which were already tense in the period before World War I, became increasingly envenomed in the inter-war period and particularly in the late 1930s. Perhaps under happier political and social conditions a way could have been found to reconcile Polish national interests with those of the large, impoverished, diverse and nationally conscious Jewish community. The conditions of the 1930s were not however conducive either to political pluralism or inter-ethnic toleration. After Jozef Pilsudski's death in May 1935, which was greatly mourned by the bulk of Poland's Jewish population, the negative features of the regime he had established became even more evident.

Anti-Semitic propaganda about the Jews of Poland distributed by the Nazis. The title says: "The Scourge of God"

These years saw an intensification of anti-Semitism, fuelled by the persistence of the Great Depression and the contagious effect of Nazi success in attacking the position of the one of the wealthiest and best integrated Jewish communities in Europe. The closer Polish ties with Germany that followed the Non-Aggression Declaration of 1934, along with the resulting greater flow of propaganda from the Reich which resulted, greatly encouraged anti-Jewish feeling in Poland. Anti-Semitism now began also to play an ever-increasing role in the political stance of the government, both as a means of winning over the younger nationalists and to divert attention from other social problems.

The period between 1935 and 1937 saw a wave of anti-Jewish violence such as attempts in smaller towns to boycott Jewish shopkeepers and market traders. There is some dispute about the number of those killed in these events and the most accurate estimate is that 14 people were killed. There were also as many as 2,000 injured. Linked with the economic boycott was the initiative in Parliament by members of the government party to pass a bill in April 1936, prohibiting Jewish ritual slaughter. It is true that arrangements were made to provide Jews with kosher meat, but this did not undo the bill's harmful effects. Given that the great majority of butchering in Poland had been done by Jews, a large number of Jewish butchers lost their jobs.

The situation of Jews at the universities also deteriorated. Their numbers diminished, and those admitted were subject to continual harassment. In October 1937, the education minister, following a request by the rectors of universities and other institutions of higher learning in October 1937, sanctioned the establishment of special "ghetto benches" for Jews in universities. A number of professors, particularly in Warsaw, Vilna, Poznaf and Lviv, opposed the decision to allow ghetto benches, but they soon became common practice at most Polish universities and polytechnics. Many Jewish students stood through lectures rather than submit to the indignity of accepting their "racial" place. Resistance to Jews in the professions also grew in this period. The government increasingly came to see the only solution to the Jewish problem in large-scale emigration. In February 1936, two conservative senators linked with the government, Karol Hubert Rostworowski and Janusz Radziwi, put forward a proposal for the mass emigration of Jews from Poland, which they justified on economic grounds. On the instructions of the Polish foreign minister Józef Beck, the Polish delegate to the Economic Commission of the League of Nations raised the question of Jewish emigration on October 5, 1936, claiming that the Jewish problem in Poland required "rapid measures of relief."

Youth created counter-cultures

The government strongly supported Jewish aspirations in Palestine, and entered into close contact with international Zionist organizations, the World Zionist Organization of Chaim Weizmann, the Jewish Agency, and particularly the Revisionists, led by Vladimir Jabotinsky. Two years later, in December 1938, General Skwarczyfski and 110 of his parliamentary colleagues in the Camp of National Unity addressed a question to the prime minister on the Jewish problem, in which they stressed that they regarded as a necessity 'the radical reduction of the number of Jews in Poland by means of massive emigration'

These developments discredited the main political groups in Polish Jewish life. The Zionists, the Orthodox and the integrationists created a new set of opportunities for groups that had played only a marginal role until the mid-1930s, the General Jewish Workers' Alliance, or Bund, the Revisionist Zionists and among a smaller group, the Communists. One further development at this time was the emergence of dynamic youth movements linked with various Zionist groupings, whose members numbered between 70,000 and 100,000 on the eve of the World War II, and with the Bund. Young people were among those most adversely affected from both the economic crisis and the rise of anti-Semitism. The youth movements created a counter-culture, an alternative home whose activities included not only politics but all aspects of cultural life.

The failure of Jewish leaders, whether Zionist, Bundist or Orthodox, highlighted the inability of Polish Jewry to achieve a common front in the face to the onslaught to which they were being subjected – in contrast to the unity among Jewish groups in Romania — and has been sharply criticized. In fact, while the Aguda and the Zionists were still often tactically at odds, they co-operated well in the Sejm after 1935. At the same time, the implacable opposition of the Bund to attempts to set up a representative Congress of Polish Jews which would speak for the whole Jewish community is in some degree a confirmation of Simon Dubnov's claim in his open letter to the Bundist daily Naye folkstsaytung on July 29, 1938 that the party had withdrawn 'from Klal Yisrael [the community of all Jews]' and did 'not see itself as part of the Jewish people, but of the Jewish proletariat.

The effect of growing anti-Semitism, coupled with the continuing depression and the actions of the government, was the progressive economic ruin of the Jewish community. In some fields, as in the sponsoring of peasant co-operatives to bypass Jewish middle men, this was not the government's principal intention. In many areas, however, the government pursued policies which could only have the effect of destroying the economic basis of the Jews in Poland without any evident gain for society as a whole.

The Jews of Warsaw on the eve of World War II

The government's virtual exclusion of Jews from the country's timber trade, in which they had hitherto played a prominent part, and their replacement by state officials, led to a radical decline in efficiency, while the refusal to grant a moratorium on the debts of traders when one was granted to peasants in 1933 ruined a large number of Jewish shopkeepers.

The tax burden on the occupations in which Jews predominated was also extremely heavy. According to one estimate, the Jews, who made up 10 per cent of the population, paid between 35 and 40 per cent of all taxes. Moreover, though the government complained of the excessive number of Jews in commerce, it allowed restrictions on the entry of Jews both into trade schools, where new skills could be acquired, and to universities. It also began to refuse recognition of professional qualifications acquired abroad by those who had been refused entry to Polish universities. The government believed that this 'cold pogrom' would force the Jews to emigrate. But as we have seen, emigration on a large scale was impossible. What was achieved was the extensive pauperization of a large section of the state's inhabitants. By the outbreak of the war, perhaps one million of the three million Jews in Poland were almost entirely dependent on relief, largely from private Jewish organizations financed from the United States.

The economic boycott was not always successful, since it required the support of local authorities in any region and was also dependent on the ability of the nascent Christian merchant class to take over from the Jews.

Thus in the aftermath of the anti-Jewish violence in Mifsk Mazowiecki, the statistician Jacob Lestchinsky filed a report that the Jewish share of commerce in the town had fallen from 81 per cent to 63 per cent. Four months later, a reporter for the popular Yiddish newspaper, Varshever Radio wrote that Jewish merchants were successfully defending their positions and many peasants were ignoring the boycott despite strong pressure from Polish townspeople; gentile shopkeepers had been unable to retain peasant business and the new starosta had forbidden the picketing of Jewish shops.

In addition, credit unions, above all the JDC, sponsored gmiles hesed kase (loan funds), which helped many Jewish artisans and traders to surmount the economic crisis. Credit associations had long played a role in the economic life of Polish Jewry, particularly in smaller towns, but they had been run by private individuals, had charged high rates of interest and required borrowers to pledge personal belongings as security.

The Joint laid the basis for its network of loan funds in 1926; by 1937 the network covered 870 of the 1,013 urban centres which numbered more that 300 Jews. They provided small interest-free loans to Jewish artisans and traders, the average loan amounting to 95 zloties (just under £20). In order to avoid political favouritism, the Joint specified that 'all social and economic groups in a particular town be united in the work of the kase…and that there exist no kases for special groups.'

Seed money for the establishment of a kase was provided once the Joint was convinced that a town had the ability to set up such a fund. The town was obliged to supplement the capital provided by the JDC and eventually to pay it back. This strategy was successful and the kases became self-supporting. Between 1929 and 1936 the percentage of capital provided by the Joint declined from 58 per cent to 47 per cent. By this time, the total capital of the different funds amounted to 10 million zloties. These funds were particularly important in smaller towns.

According to a survey conducted in the late 1930s, Jewish small traders obtained half their capital from the funds, one fifth from private money lenders, 10 per cent from private banks and 5 per cent from commercial savings institutions. Half of the borrowers were small traders and one third were artisans. One of the key figures in setting up these organizations was the historian Emanuel Ringelblum, later to be the creator of the underground archive in the Warsaw ghetto, who edited the project's journal, Folkshilf.

Several other factors need to be taken into account in assessing the situation of the Jews in Poland on the eve of the war. Firstly, the rapid progress of polonization among the community, particularly in central Poland would clearly have had some impact on the way Polish-Jewish relations developed without the war. It is also a fact that apart from the restriction on shchitah, no actual anti-Jewish legislation was enacted in Poland before the outbreak of the war. There had been earlier periods of crisis in Polish-Jewish relations – the 'Jewish war' of 1859 – provoked by accusations in the run-up to the 1863 uprising that Jews were not sympathetic to Polish national aspirations, and the tense period after the Duma election in Warsaw in October 1912.

These crises had been surmounted and certainly in the run-up to the war, after Hitler's repudiation of the Polish-German non-aggression agreement, there was a period of Polish-Jewish solidarity in the face of the threat from Nazi Germany. Yet the conclusion has to be pessimistic. A cautious observer, Jerzy Tomaszewski, after pointing out that mass emigration, which was by now the preferred option of the government, was not feasible, came to the following conclusion:

A lasting solution to the social and economic problems of the Jews in Poland has thus to be sought in Poland, in close association with the whole range of problems faced by the country. It is difficult today to reach a conclusion on the chances of finding such a solution, because the outbreak of the war made a breach in the normal evolution of the country. If one takes into account the situation which prevailed at the end of the 1930s, the prospects for lasting solutions must seem doubtful.

Those worst affected by the deteriorating situation of the Jews were the young people. Abraham Rotfarb was a young Jew who entered the competition organized by YIVO for the best autobiography of someone of his generation. This is how he described his situation:

I am a poor assimilated soul. I am a Jew and a Pole, or rather I was a Jew, but gradually, under the influence of my environment, under the influence of the place where I lived, and under the influence of the language, the culture, and the literature, I have also become a Pole. I love Poland; its language, its culture, and most of all the fact of its freedom and the heroism of its struggle for independence, all pluck at my heartstrings and fire my feelings and enthusiasm. But I do not love that Poland which hates me for no apparent reason, that Poland which tears at my heart and soul, which drives me into a state of apathy, melancholy, and dark depression. Poland has taken away my happiness; it has turned me into a dog who, not having any ambitions of his own, asks only not to be abandoned in the wasteland of culture but to be drawn onto the road of Polish cultural life. Poland has brought me up as a Pole, but brands me a Jew who has to be driven out. I want to be a Pole, you have not let me be one; I want to be a Jew, but I don't know how, I have become alienated from Jewishness. (I do not like myself as a Jew.)

I am already lost.

There was however another side to Polish-Jewish life on the eve of World War II. In the spring of 1939, Martin Buber – who had just left Germany for Palestine – paid a visit to Poland on behalf of the Friends of the Hebrew University. He was welcomed enthusiastically everywhere among the Jews as an outstanding compatriot and an admired activist, philosopher and scholar. It is striking that the leading figures in Polish Jewry, faced with what we know was a deadly threat to their own existence, should have been able to devote so much energy to the Jewish national revival and to its spiritual embodiment, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, which Buber represented.

Antony Polonsky is Albert Abramson Professor of Holocaust Studies at Brandeis University and the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum. His most recent work is The Jews in Poland and Russia volume 1, 1350-1881; volume 2 1881-1914 (to appear in 2009).

Kazimierz synagogues are a last link...

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Kazimierz, the oldest Jewish district in Krakow, has an unrivalled collection of synagogues, including the oldest shul in Poland.

In major Polish cities like Warsaw, Lodz and Lublin, the Nazis virtually destroyed all the synagogues as they persecuted and murdered their Jewish inhabitants.

But in Krakow, they left them standing, even after damaging or using them as storage facilities. As a result, these synagogues are one of the last remaining links to prewar Polish Jewry.

The Old Synagogue (24 Szeroka St.), originally built in 1407, is the oldest surviving shul in Poland, though it has been repeatedly renovated through the centuries. During the Nazi occupation, it was used as a warehouse and its furnishings were vandalized and looted.

After the war it lay in ruins, at which point the Polish government remodelled and converted it into the Museum of Jewish History. Its exhibits consist of, among other items, Torah scrolls, crowns and shields, shofars, seder plates, textiles, utensils and photographs.

Its bookshop is a treasure trove of information on Polish Jewry.

shul in Kazimierz, is also its only functioning one in a city with about 200 self-declared Jews.

Founded in the mid-15th century by the Isserles family of rabbinical renown, the synagogue has a vaulted ceiling, tile floors and yellow walls. It is lit by four chandeliers. Although it was wrecked by the Nazis, it has been restored to its former glory.

The adjoining walled cemetery, which is in reasonably good condition, contains more than 700 tombstones, some dating back to the 1550s. It is thus one of Poland's oldest Jewish cemeteries.

The Popper Synagogue (16 Szeroka St.) was built by a merchant in 1620 and rebuilt in the 19th and 20th centuries. After destroying its interior, the Nazis used it as a shed. It is a cultural centre today. During Krakow's Jewish Cultural Festival in June and July, the walls were covered with children's watercolours and a poster reading "Let's Design a Synagogue."

The late-Renaissance High Synagogue (38 Jozefa St.) was Kazimierz's third shul after the Old Synagogue and the Remuh Synagogue. Constructed in the mid-1500s, it is the only shul in the city whose prayer hall is situated on the second floor, hence its name.

Desecrated by the Nazis, the synagogue boasts having the most comprehensive Jewish bookshop in Poland. During the Jewish Cultural Festival, it was the venue for a photographic exhibition on Polish Jews.

The Tempel Synagogue (24 Miodowa St.), which dates back to 1862, is Krakow's only Reform shul. With its beige facade, golden Star of David beckoning from the roof and its richly finished interior of gold leaf, this synagogue is truly a sight to behold.

Ransacked by the Nazis, it was used as an ammunition storage depot.

Directly behind Krakow's Jewish community centre, it underwent renovation between 1995 and 2000, and was the site of several performances during the Jewish Cultural Festival.

The Kupa Synagogue (8 Warszawera) is a testament to 17th century architecture. A matzah factory after World War II, it is currently a cultural centre. Beyond some frescoes with Hebrew inscriptions, little remains of its original interior.

The Izaak Synagogue (Miodowa St.), established in 1638, is also a cultural centre. Its beige stucco facade is more impressive than its beige interior of fading frescoes and Hebrew lettering.

Synagogues enjoyed pride of place at one of the events of the recent Jewish Cultural Festival.

An exhibition by Polish photographer Wojcieh Wilczyk, There's No Such Thing As An Innocent Eye, was a showcase for synagogues in Poland that have been preserved, fallen into disrepair and abandoned, or stripped of their original function. Among the towns in which these synagogues are found are Nowy Korczyn, Dabrowa Tarnowska, Wielkie Oczy and Opoczno.

At the National Museum in Krakow, the Judaica collection, one of the largest in Poland, focused on artifacts from Galician synagogues. On display for the duration of the Jewish Cultural Festival were Torah crowns and curtains, kiddush cups, spice boxes, yarmulkes, dreidels and bridal headdresses.

This low-key exhibition was yet another window into the world of Polish Jews before the Holocaust.

Broken promises and redemptive yearnings: Jewish intellectuals and German universities before WW II

By PAUL FRANKS

Imagine a world where, regardless of religion or ethnicity, you could pursue your intellectual interests, whatever they may be. Imagine a world where you could pursue the course of education that best matches your interests, and in which you may, if you are the best candidate, find a job that allows you to investigate the questions that concern you most, with all necessary institutional support and security.

For many generations of Jewish intellectuals, this world was no more than a pipe dream.

The establishment of schools has long been a priority of Jewish communities, but formal education for girls is a recent development, the provision of general as well as Jewish studies has been the exception rather than the rule and jobs suited to intellectuals have been few and far between.

It is hard not to be astonished at the productivity of scholars such as Moses Maimonides (1135-1204), who needed to earn a living in areas different from their intellectual pursuits, often while contributing greatly to communal affairs.

A few were fortunate enough to be supported, along with their students, by personal or communal wealth, and rabbinic studies have frequently been pursued at high levels of sophistication and in communication with similarly minded specialists in other parts of the Jewish world.

However, with the exception of medical studies at the University of Padua in Italy and, later, a handful of other schools, Jews had no access to university: the institutional framework developed by European Christians dedicated to teaching and research, which has been the key to the West's intellectual and economic successes.

Baruch Spinoza

Jews could obtain knowledge of the latest developments in areas of study that are not tied specifically to Judaism, and interaction with a broader community of thinkers and scholars only with the help of the rarest of commodities: luck.

The exclusion of Jews from general intellectual life was, of course, part and parcel of their exclusion from the general political life of Europe. In the 17th century, however, Baruch Spinoza (1632-1677) – the Dutch Jewish philosopher of Portuguese descent who had been banned from the Jewish community of Amsterdam – envisaged a new kind of state, one which would grant citizenship to all regardless of their religious and philosophical opinions, and which would guarantee freedom of thought.

In the most liberal European country, he was tolerated despite his "dangerous" ideas. He survived several hostile campaigns, but it would take a century or more before Jews would be granted civil rights in accordance with his vision. When Spinoza was offered a professorship at the University of Heidelberg in 1673, he declined the offer. The friendly configuration of interests leading to the offer could hardly be expected to last long.

Without a guarantee of academic freedom, Spinoza preferred the life of someone who earned enough to support his intellectual pursuits and who was fortunate enough to make contact with other philosophers and natural scientists. Nonetheless, 1673 marks the beginning of the long romance between German universities and Jewish intellectuals, a romance that would end in bitter betrayal.

In the 18th century, leading Jewish intellectuals who wanted to pursue and contribute to general studies would have to follow Spinoza's model – though, fortunately, excommunication was not obligatory.

Like him, they were self-taught and applied the analytical skills attained through their rabbinic educations to other areas, and they supported themselves however they could. They had no institutional framework. If they were fortunate and persistent, they might enjoy fruitful relations with Christian thinkers and scholars, and they could also become part of an informal network of like-minded Jews.

Raphael Levi Hannover

Thus, Raphael Levi Hannover (1685-1779), a private tutor, became the informal student and secretary of Gottfried Wilhelm Leibniz (1646-1716). Moses Mendelssohn (1729-1786), a bookkeeper, would not have published his work in philosophy and literary criticism without the support of his friend Gotthold Ephraim Lessing (1729-1781).

Whatever advantages these men had – flowing from their Talmudic educations – were unavailable to female Jewish intellectuals such as Henriette Herz (1764-1847), Rahel Levin (1771-1833) and Mendelssohn's daughters, Dorothea (1764-1839) and Henriette (1775-1831), who could only cultivate intellectual friendships by hosting salons.

Moses Mendelssohn

The French Revolution changed everything – though not all at once – by issuing a promise honoured more in its breach than in its fulfilment.

In France in 1791, Jews were granted civil rights, and the idea of emancipating Jews spread to other European countries by means of Napoleon's sword. However, implementation fell far short of the ideal, and there was considerable resistance to the emancipation of the Jews, not least in regions conquered by Napoleon, where, in addition to attracting the resentment of those who feared increasing competition for livelihoods and resources, it was now branded as a foreign imposition.

Leopold Zunz

It was during the Napoleonic occupation of Prussia that the aforementioned salon hostesses converted to Christianity, in part because Prussian resentment of French Revolutionary ideas, including the idea of equality for Jews, put them under pressure to demonstrate where their loyalties lay: with the French, as well as their fellow Jews, or with their German, Christian intellectual comrades.

Still, the promise of equal involvement in general political and intellectual life had now been made. Over the next century and a half, it would repeatedly be betrayed, undermined and repudiated. Occasionally it would be kept, but it could not be unmade.

Throughout the 19th century, Jewish intellectuals from Germany and Eastern Europe entered German universities in search of education and, with less success, careers. Between the French Revolution and World War I, Germany invented the modern research university. Jews who studied there, including Jewish women after 1908, contributed greatly to all disciplines while laying the foundations for much of what we now call Jewish Studies.

All too often, however, the price to be paid for a professorship was conversion to Christianity.

Consider the members of the Verein für Kultur und Wissenschaft der Juden (Association for the Culture and Science of the Jews), founded at the University of Berlin in 1819, not long after Napoleon's defeat. They sought to apply to the study of Judaism the new historical methods developed in German universities, partly out of the conviction that Judaism mattered and partly out of zeal for the new scholarship. As students, they were determined to remain Jews, and their hopes rested on the Prussian Emancipation Edict issued in 1812 under French occupation, which opened academic positions to all.

In 1822, however, when their erstwhile leader, Eduard Gans (1789-1837), philosopher of law and Hegel's assistant, applied for a position, the law was changed to bar Jews once again. Three years later, in order to take the job, Gans converted. He was followed reluctantly by fellow Verein member, critic and poet Heinrich Heine (1797-1856), who remarked, "The baptismal certificate is the ticket of admission to European culture."

Another member of the Verein, Leopold Zunz (1794-1886), whose meticulous studies of synagogue sermons and liturgies established a new paradigm for Jewish history, took a different path. He did not convert, and never attained a university position. Instead he helped to run one of the Jewish community's own educational institutions: a Jewish teachers' training seminary, founded in Berlin in 1840.

The seminary where Zunz taught was one of several institutions arising from an educational revolution in the Jewish community, necessitated by the fact that, in the 19th century, the old yeshivot, associated with the kehillot that had enjoyed relative autonomy in Europe before the rise of the nation state, and run by the chief rabbis of significant communities and/or scholarly reputations, died out in Germany and faded away in Eastern Europe.

In Lithuania they were eclipsed by new yeshivot, attracting both funding and students from throughout the country and beyond as a result of their rigorous teachers, elitist reputations and distinctive traditions. The paradigm, which was to some extent a return to the yeshivot of the geonim a thousand years earlier, was established in 1802 by Rabbi Hayyim of Volozhin (1749-1821), student of the renowned Vilna Gaon (1720-1797). Meanwhile, the chassidic movement gave rise to dynasties and courts which, in their own ways, replaced the old kehillot. By the end of the 19th century, some of these would also found yeshivot on the new model.

In Germany, the old, local yeshivot were replaced by seminaries for the training of rabbis and teachers. The Jüdisches-Theologisches Seminar (Jewish Theological Seminary) in Breslau, which combined the scholarly approach pioneered by the Verein with a conservative attitude towards observance, opened in 1854. The traditionalist Orthodox Israelitische Lehrerbildungsanstalt (Jewish Teacher Training Institute) began training teachers in Würzburg in 1863. The liberal Hochschule für die Wissenschaft des Judentums (Advanced School for the Science of Judaism) began operating in Berlin in 1872, followed a year later in the same city by the Rabbiner Seminar für das Orthodoxe Judentum (Rabbinical Seminary for Orthodox Judaism).

Hermann Cohen

Unlike the Lithuanian yeshivot, which dedicated themselves to studying Torah for its own sake, the German seminaries undertook to train religious and educational functionaries. They also provided institutional bases for the teaching and research of major scholars, whose contributions were foundational for Jewish Studies and, sometimes, for scholarship in general.

For example, Jakob Bernays (1824-1881) – son of the renowned Hakham Bernays (1792-1849) and uncle of Sigmund Freud's wife – taught at the Breslau seminary from its inception, and made a decisive contribution to the historical study of classical Greek texts.

Meanwhile, the Orthodox seminary in Berlin came to represent the coexistence of German historical scholarship and Lithuanian Talmud scholarship, embodied in its two final rectors, both products of the Lithuanian yeshiva of Slabodka: Rabbi Abraham Eliyahu Kaplan (1890-1934) and Rabbi Yehiel Yaakov Weinberg (1878-1966).

In Germany, university teachers were civil servants, so academic appointments required a change in the law. No affirmative action policy was ever implemented to change attitudes.

Moritz Abraham Stern

Until the unification that followed the Franco-Prussian War of 1870-71, the various regions proceeded at their own paces. The natural and exact sciences were also less hostile than other disciplines.

Prussia changed its law in 1847, whereupon Robert Remak (1815-65), a physiologist, became the first unbaptized, Jewish privatdozent (unpaid lecturer).

Moritz Abraham Stern (1807-94), a mathematician, became the first ordinary (full) professor at Göttingen in 1859, but this hardly opened the floodgates. Jews tended to spend longer in unpaid positions, and some distinguished scholars – such as Moritz Lazarus (1824-1903), one of the founders of the discipline of Völkerpsychologie (psychology of peoples) – received much recognition without any regular appointment.

By the end of the 1870s, although the civil service law had been altered throughout Germany, and although many Jews were already well-established within a variety of disciplines, there were only 20 unbaptized Jewish professors in the country.

Still, this was progress. Slowly, it seemed, the promise was being kept. Nobody better represented this fulfilment during the heyday of Jewish intellectual life in imperial Germany than Hermann Cohen (1842-1918), who, on his second attempt, was appointed to a chair in philosophy at the University of Marburg in 1876.

Chairs in philosophy played a special role in German national culture. They were secular pulpits whose occupants – at the University of Berlin, founded during the French occupation as an act of resistance and hope, figures such as Fichte, Hegel, and Schelling, who remain central to philosophy today – helped to create the self-understanding of a nation that still existed more as an idea than as an actuality.

Students came to hear Cohen

Cohen was not only a masterful writer and teacher, he was the founder of a school – the Marburg school of Neo-Kantianism. Through his students and junior colleagues, as well as his own work, his profound impact on contemporaneous philosophy would endure until the 1920s.

Cohen was also a knowledgeable, proud and articulate Jew. Beginning in 1880, he heeded the call to respond to the anti-Semitic attacks that were, along with the increasing involvement of Jews, a growing feature of political and intellectual life. Without ever becoming parochial or forfeiting his status as a systematic philosopher of the first rank, Cohen became increasingly interested in Judaism and its philosophical importance, culminating in his late classic Religion of Reason: Out of the Sources of Judaism (1919).

Gershom Scholem

No wonder Jewish students, among others, came to hear Cohen lecture at Marburg. After retiring from Marburg, he began teaching at the Hochschule in Berlin, where his classes were attended by some of the stars of the next generation: Franz Rosenzweig (1887-1929), Gershom Scholem (1897-1982) and Leo Strauss (1899-1973).

Cohen had come full circle: he had begun his higher education within one communal institution, the Breslau seminary, and he now ended his career at another. Nevertheless, the university had provided the setting for the core of his career, enabling his ideas and relations to reach far beyond the Jewish community within which he had begun and ended.

Ernst Cassirer

In Cohen's case, the promise had been kept. But this hardly meant that the next generation had no obstacles to overcome.

Ernst Cassirer (1874-1945), Cohen's closest student, could not obtain a stipendiary appointment for many years, despite his undisputed accomplishments.

Leo Strauss

During World War I, nationalist fervour led to increasing anti-Semitism, notwithstanding Cohen's argument that Germanism and Judaism were so interlinked that Jews throughout the world should support the German cause, or at least prevent America from intervening to defeat it.

When, in a 1916 issue of the Kant Society's periodical, Bruno Bauch distinguished between the essentially German philosophy of Kant and the essentially Jewish views of Cohen, both Cohen and Cassirer resigned from the journal's editorial board.

The defeat of Germany and the establishment of the Weimar Republic brought the tensions inherent in German Jewish intellectual life to an almost unbearable tension. On the one hand, Jews were more central than ever to intellectual affairs, and they attained academic stature to an unprecedented degree.

Cassirer became not only professor of philosophy at the University of Hamburg in 1919, but also the country's first unbaptized Jewish rector in 1929-30. However, because Jews were widely blamed for Germany's defeat and were seen as the beneficiaries of a political regime that seemed a foreign imposition, anti-Semitism continued to hamper Jewish aspirations.

In any event, like many German intellectuals who had come of age in the war years, Jewish intellectuals were alienated from the classical German culture that had captivated their parents. Cohen's German-Jewish symbiosis was hollow. If the promise required one to "fit in" with desiccated ideas and a corrupt culture, then it was not worth pursuing.

When, in a debate at Davos in 1929, Cassirer championed the humanism of Kant, Schiller and Cohen against Martin Heidegger's retrieval of questions suppressed by western civilization since antiquity, the Jewish students present – including Emmanuel Levinas (1906-95) and Leo Strauss – took Heidegger's side. Franz Rosenzweig argued that Heidegger, not Cassirer, was in tune with the profound insights of Cohen's late work at the Hochschule.

Not one of them anticipated that Heidegger would soon join the Nazi party, volunteering in 1934 to help bring the University of Freiburg into line with the ideology of national purity and dictatorial governance.

The World War I generation were not, like their forebears, seeking to establish themselves within German culture. They had been born into the world of German ideas, and several knew more about being German than about being Jewish. Many of them would have been happy to attain university positions enabling them to think, teach and write. But they yearned, above all, for what no academic career could provide: redemption.

Some, like Hans Ehrenberg (1883-1958), converted to Christianity – not under pressure, like Gans and Heine, but out of a deep, religious conviction that was in revolt against bourgeois life, whether Jewish or not. Others, like his cousin, Rosenzweig, returned to the Jewish community in order to revitalize its cultural life.

Friedrich Meinecke, a prominent intellectual historian who had supervised Rosenzweig's doctoral dissertation, must have been astonished to receive a letter informing him that Rosenzweig would not be pursuing an academic career after all because of a "dark drive," which he named "my Judaism."

Many gave up on Europe

Even before the disaster of 1918, Rosenzweig had lost faith in the ideal German state, which would live up to all its promises to its citizens, regardless of religion or ethnicity the state for which Cohen and Meinecke longed

Instead, Rosenzweig responded to a call from Nehemiah Nobel (1871-1922), a prominent Frankfurt rabbi who had distinguished himself as a Talmudist at the Orthodox seminary in Berlin, and who had then taken time off from his rabbinical duties to write a doctoral dissertation under Cohen at Marburg.

Franz Rosenzweig

Nobel invited Rosenzweig to head a recently established beit hamidrash of an innovative kind the Freies Jüdisches Lehrhaus (Independent Jewish Study House), where Jews of every religious persuasion and background would be welcome to study Jewish tradition.

During the war, Rosenzweig had written the single most important work of modern Jewish philosophy, The Star of Redemption (1920), and he now established new directions in popular Jewish education, attracting a circle of remarkable people who brought their university educations into mutually challenging relations with Jewish tradition. Some, like Rosenzweig himself, returned to Jewish observances that had long been abandoned by their parents, or even their grandparents. For him, redemption would be found, not in politics, but in the traditional, messianic hope of everyday Jewish life.

Rabbi Yosef Dov Soloveitchik

The 1920s saw a renaissance in German Jewish intellectual, religious and cultural life. German universities attracted some of the greatest products of both Lithuanian yeshivot and chassidic courts including Rabbi Yosef Dov Soloveitchik (1903-93) and Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson (1902-94). But the storm clouds were gathering, and some sought redemption in radical alternatives to German-Jewish life.

Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson

Philosopher and literary critic Georg Lukács (1885-1971), who had known Ehrenberg and Rosenzweig at Heidelberg, was attracted to Marxism, and the Russian Revolution ignited his imagination.

Lukács served as deputy to the commissar for education in the short-lived Hungarian Soviet Republic. His classic work, History and Class Consciousness (1923), articulated the ideas that became the basis for the western Marxist tradition, which was developed by the mostly Jewish members of the Frankfurt School based at the Institute for Social Research. It made explicit the critique of capitalist reification, which served as an analogue of the Jewish rejection of idolatry and the messianic role of the proletariat

Others gave up on Europe altogether. In 1923, Gershom Scholem left Germany for Palestine after earning his doctorate with a groundbreaking study of the early kabbalistic work, the Sefer ha-Bahir.

In 1924, the Institute for Jewish Studies was established at the Hebrew University, whose cornerstone had been laid in 1918. Scholem, who had been hired as librarian, found a lifelong home for his teaching and research, which would establish the groundwork for the field of kabbalistic studies.

If the French Revolution changed everything, so did the German presidential election of 1932, which quickly swept Hitler to power.

On April 7, 1933, the first step was taken to reverse the effects of emancipation in Germany. The Law for the Restoration of the Professional Civil Service dismissed all non-Aryan civil servants unless they were World War I veterans or had been in office since August 1914. Those with unreliable political opinions were dismissed as well.

In practice, exemptions were not always honoured, and most Jewish academics lost their positions. Nor did baptism help, since Judaism had become a racial, not a religious, designation.

While a handful of non-Jewish academics objected, for which they soon lost their jobs on political grounds, there was no mass protest by German faculty and students. It was, in the words of Julien Benda (1867-1956), "the betrayal of the intellectuals."

Expelled from the universities, German Jewish intellectual life could subsist only in exile or withdrawal. One could seek an academic job in another country or could withdraw to a Jewish community institution, either in another country or within Germany, where they continued to function – and, indeed, enjoyed a new breath of life – until Kristallnacht in 1938.

The members of the Frankfurt School were fortunate enough to move their institute to New York after a brief interlude in Geneva, although several of them felt uncomfortable with American culture.

Hannah Arendt (1906-1975), who had been seduced by Heidegger as a student and who completed her second dissertation in 1933, was unable to receive the teaching licence that she had earned.

Hitler did not silence the voices

When it became unsafe for her to continue gathering information on German anti-Semitism, she joined Youth Aliyah in France, arranging for the resettlement of German Jewish children in Palestine, and later worked for the Jewish Agency.

Confronted by the choice between different varieties of redemption, Walter Benjamin (1892-1940) dithered. He could not decide whether to cast his lot with his Zionist friend Scholem in Palestine or with his Marxist friends in the Soviet Union. Meanwhile, he wrote his last, great work – a portrait of the 19th century as crystallized in the Paris Arcades – employing an innovative method that continues to influence the humanities today.

For German Jews who had not escaped from Europe by 1939, the options had all but run out. When war broke out on Sept. 1, the walls seemed to finally close in. Benjamin was interned at a camp in Nevers and in May 1940, Arendt was interned at Gurs.

Benjamin would eventually die a mysterious death on the Spanish border, while Arendt would proceed to Lisbon and then to New York, carrying with her Benjamin's Theses on the Philosophy of History, which he had entrusted to her in Marseilles.

The ninth thesis in the book envisaged the Angelus Novus, painted by Paul Klee – a prized possession of Benjamin's – as the angel of history: "His face is turned towards the past. Where we perceive a chain of events, he sees one single catastrophe which keeps piling wreckage upon wreckage and hurls it in front of his feet. The angel would like to stay, awaken the dead and make whole what has been smashed. But a storm is blowing from Paradise; it has got caught in his wings with such violence that the angel can no longer close them. This storm irresistibly propels him into the future to which his back is turned, while the pile of debris before him grows skyward. This storm is what we call progress."

Walter Benjamin

Were the Jewish intellectuals who were both formed and betrayed by the German universities nothing more than pieces of wreckage? Or were they angels of history, looking with horror on a catastrophe that they would nevertheless survive?

To this day, their epoch-making works central, not only to Jewish studies, but to philosophy and the humanities in general – still bear the question's scar. Thus, Scholem's classic overview of the field of kabbalistic studies, Major Trends in Jewish Mysticism, delivered as lectures in 1938, were dedicated when published in 1941 to the memory of his friend, Walter Benjamin.

Inconceivable without the scholarly and philosophical achievements of the German universities, the learning of Scholem's rabbinic teachers and the conversation of his fellow German Jewish intellectuals, the book directs our gaze towards Benjamin's obscure grave, even as it still speaks to us from the midst of World War II, in a voice that Hitler could not silence.

L'ora Desiciva: The decisive hour

By MARY DORIA RUSSELL

On Sept. 1, 1939, the banner headline of Milan's Corriere della serra (Evening Courier) read, "Scocca l'ora decisiva!" Beneath the announcement that "the hour of decision" had arrived, front page articles described the "end of Germany's patience" with "the bitter intransigence of Poland," and declared that England must bear "a tremendous responsibility" for the conflict.

The German army's know-how and modern equipment was praised; its swift victory over the "backward and obsolete" Polish military was confidently predicted. Three days later, La Stampa's evening edition would announce "L'inizio delle operazioni terrestri, marittime e aeree." The commencement of land, sea and air operations by Germany marked the beginning of "the struggle for a New Europe."

Most Jewish Italians would have read these headlines through the prism of national politics, not religion.

They were neither Sephardi nor Ashkenazi, but rather Italkim: fiercely nationalistic, ferociously Italian Jews who had, as a people and as individuals, deep roots in Italy. Some 10,000 Jews flourished in the city of Rome under Julius Caesar and Caesar Augustus and at the beginning of the Common Era, Flavius Josephus estimated that 10 per cent of the Roman Empire's overall population was Jewish.

Despite periodic military trouble on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean, conversions to Judaism were frequent enough to be noted by contemporary Roman historians. Rome itself remained a good place to be Jewish for about 500 years – until the Emperor Constantine jettisoned the traditional Roman religious tolerance and made Christianity the state religion.

After the fall of the Empire, the Italian peninsula broke into a dozen or so small warring states. In some places and during some of the next 1,600 years, Italy was the best place in Europe to be Jewish; in other places and other times, it was the most backward and intolerant: the Papal States, which stretched across the central third of the peninsula, had a record of vicious anti-Semitism. But there were always regions of Italy where Jews were a welcome part of the general community.

In the 1860s, Jews were prominent at the very beginning of the modern Italian state as Mazzini, Cavour and Garibaldi led the fight to unify the peninsula, beating back the armed forces supporting the Pope's political power. By the time the war for unification was won and the Papal States reduced to Vatican City, Jews had earned full citizenship and were passionately committed to the royal House of Savoia and to the Italian nation.

Until 1938, the Italkim lived in a nation that was not simply devoid of anti-Semitism, but actively Judeophilic. They were a tiny minority – only 50,000 souls in a nation of more than 40 million by the 1930s – but in the decades since unification, there had already been a Jewish prime minister, Jewish senators and mayors. Jews were distinguished jurists, civil servants, doctors, teachers and engineers.

When the French were railroading Dreyfus, and when it was illegal for a Jew to become an officer of the German or Russian armed forces, Italy had Jewish admirals and generals. Both the oldest and youngest decorated Italian heroes of World War I were Jews, and Jews were highly respected as officers and as enlisted men. Ordinary Italians felt honored to have a Jew visit their home, and the Italkim had long been considered part of Italy's intellectual, political and professional elite.

None of that changed when Mussolini's Fascist Party came to power in 1922. Jews became fascisti in exactly the same proportion as other Italians – about 10 per cent – and they continued to join Mussolini's party for the same reasons that made people around the world turn to charismatic political leaders who seemed to have solutions to intractable problems. They were concerned about the bloody communist takeover in Russia, only five years before Mussolini's rise to power. They craved order after years of strikes and chaos that followed the devastation of World War I and the 1918 flu pandemic. They wanted to see the unified Italy they loved join the other nations of Europe as a great power.

Nation was dumbfounded by anti-Semitic race laws

Mussolini and Hitler stand together after their alliance is cemented.

There was nothing inherently anti-Semitic about Italian fascism. Mussolini openly admired Judaism and early in his regime, there were Jewish fascisti at the top of his government. Mussolini had Jewish friends, even a Jewish mistress. His daughter very nearly married a Jew when she was young, and she wasn't the only one. In 1939, half of all Italian Jews were married to Catholics.

Interfaith marriage distressed clergy of both religions, but most Italians saw it as evidence of a religious tolerance and cultural sophistication unmatched elsewhere in the world at that time.

With their long history of integration and intermarriage, even the most observant and religiously serious Jews of Italy looked, dressed, sounded and acted just like everyone else. Except in Rome itself, where a distinctive Jewish neighborhood still existed near the Vatican, Italkim lived in mixed neighborhoods. Jews and Catholics grew up together, went to school together. They were on the same soccer teams, they worked together, ate and argued together, they married one another. By the late 1930s, every native-born Italian Jew had Catholic relatives, Catholic friends, Catholic co-workers and neighbours. Catholic Italians either knew Jews personally or knew and admired them as public figures.

So the entire nation was dumbfounded when Mussolini crumbled under pressure from Berlin in 1938 and issued his own anti-Semitic race laws, sharply circumscribing the lives of the Italkim.

Around the country, the initial reaction to the conceit of racially pure "Italian Aryans" was utter disbelief, followed by shrieks of laughter. Rome, after all, had conquered the entire Mediterranean basin. The legionnaires remained garrisoned in these conquered regions for years. They often settled down, married local girls, had kids and brought their families back home when their deployment was over.

Italy itself had been invaded by just about everyone in Europe and North Africa at one time or another: Carthaginians, Goths, Visigoths, Gauls, Vandals, Spaniards, the French, the Scots, the English and the Austrians, with all the ensuing raping and pillaging that conquest generally entails.

Germany's vicious occupation lasted 20 months

Furthermore, the Italian peninsula had the longest warm water seacoast in Europe. Its cities (and prostitutes) had been visited by sailors from around the world for thousands of years.

Before long, the race laws were widely understood to be an embarrassing fiction, cooked up to appease that strange little man Hitler, and not to be taken seriously. There were many exemptions and many legal ways for Italian Jews to become "Aryanized," in addition to subterfuge and minor bribery or the co-operation of a friend in a variety of circumventions.

Granted, the race laws were distressing, insulting and damaging, but the Italians took a vast amount of perverse pleasure in ignoring laws they didn't care for.

As the year went by, most Italkim had found ways to work around the race laws, while Catholic Italians continued to consult Jewish doctors and lawyers and looked for opportunities to employ or support Jewish friends and neighbours and relatives under the table. Rabbis remained legal authorities of the fascist state and the Italkim were well-organized as a community.

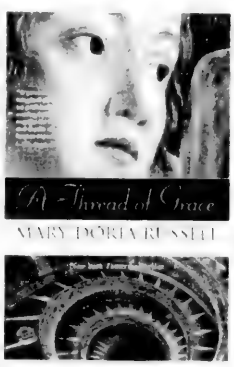
DELASEM (the Delegation for the Assistance to Hebrew Emigrants) was a state-sanctioned association already active in helping in Jewish refugees who had taken shelter in Italy from Germany's influence on other parts of Europe.

Reading the headlines on Sept. 1, 1939, the Italkim were beginning to realize that even a limited war would make things harder for Jews, but they still confidently thought of themselves as the givers of tzedakah, not as those in need of aid.

They were uneasy about the future, for Mussolini had frequently said that war was the natural state of a young and virile nation like Italy. Nevertheless they took comfort from the fact that Mussolini's son-in-law, Count Ciano, had worked tirelessly all summer to prevent a shooting war between Germany and Poland. Mussolini opposed Hitler's designs on Poland, and the Italian government had protested Germany's recent alliance with the Soviet Union – a move that had astonished the fervently anti-communist fascisti.

Most reassuring of all, was that within hours of the outbreak of hostilities between Germany and Poland, Mussolini issued an official communiqué – backed by King Vittorio Emmanuele III and by a large majority of the Italian public – declaring a strict neutrality in that conflict.

So when Italian Jews went to bed on Sept. 1, 1939, they might have been disgusted, nervous or excited, depending on their political leanings, but they did not yet feel directly threatened – as Jews or as Italians.



Mussolini would soon lead his nation into war and would place Italy at Nazi Germany's side for three catastrophic years. When il Duce was deposed in 1943, Italy immediately began secret negotiations for a separate peace. On the day U.S. commander-in-chief, General Dwight Eisenhower, announced the Italian forces' surrender, Italy's jilted ally began a vicious and vindictive occupation that lasted 20 months.

Throughout the war and the German occupation, the divisions in Italy remained political, not religious. As a Catholic peasant told the Jewish refugee Piera Sonnino in 1944, "Humanity is not divided between Jews and Christians, but between those who possess everything and those who possess nothing, between those who work... and those who take."

When Germany surrendered in 1945, 85 per cent of the Jews of Italy were still alive: the highest Jewish survivorship in occupied Europe. Their story is told in A Thread Of Grace (Ballantine, 2005) by Mary Doria Russell.

The Yishuv at the outbreak of war

By DVORA HACOHEN

The day World War II broke out, Sept. 1, 1939, found the Yishuv, the Jewish community in pre-state Israel, at one of its lowest, most difficult points. Aliyah, which had been vital for the Yishuv, had been gravely stifled, at a time when the Jews of Europe were desperately searching for places to find sanctuary.

To comprehend the crushing reality of the conditions in Palestine in September 1939, we have to look back at the events that led to that point.

The 1930s were one of the stormiest periods in the history of the Yishuv.

Even as the British Mandate – which started in Palestine in 1920 after the famous Balfour Declaration of November 1917 – had aroused great hopes for a new era in the building of a Jewish homeland in Palestine, complex realities and stumbling blocks developed that were far more serious than expected.

The 1930s started in the shadow of the events of 1929: widespread Arab riots across the land in which Jewish settlements were attacked, fields and houses burned, and Jews driving in their cars were ambushed on the road. Some 150 Jews were killed and hundreds more were wounded in the violence of 1929. Many Jews were expelled from their homes in Hebron, Jerusalem and elsewhere. The disturbances were traumatic for the Yishuv and raised the conflict with the Arabs to centre stage.

In hindsight, we realize that these events haunted the Yishuv throughout the '30s and had a critical influence on the policies of the British mandatory regime. The ups and downs of the economic and political fortunes of the Yishuv were reflected in the changing state of aliyah.

In the first half of the 1930s, it appeared as though the Yishuv had begun to recover from the significant economic crisis it experienced at the end of the 1920s. Starting in 1933, with Adolf Hitler's rise to power, aliyah was reinvigorated and increased dramatically.

The Nazi regime in Germany signaled a new era of radicalization in the persecution of Jews in Europe. In Poland, too, where the largest Jewish communities lived, the situation was critical. After the death in 1935 of Joseph Pilsudski, who had virtually ruled Poland, the ground beneath the feet of Polish Jews trembled. Conditions worsened dramatically for them. Hundreds of thousands were stripped of citizenship and turned into refugees, but they had no place to which to immigrate.

In the years 1933 to 1936, the British had not yet placed harsh restrictions on aliyah. In those years, about 165,000 Jews landed in Palestine, the majority of whom came from Poland, though some were from Germany. The population of the Yishuv doubled from 175,000 to 340,000 Jews.

But in the second half of the decade, there was a marked negative change in British relations with the Yishuv. The result was a full blown crisis for the Yishuv.

The British goal in 1936 was to stop aliyah

The Arab revolt that erupted in 1936 began with a general strike by the Arab community, and then evolved into riots against Jews and Jewish settlements. The Arabs hoped to break the morale and spirit of the Yishuv, but the Jewish leadership coped with the challenge and showed their mettle and wisdom: when the Jaffa port was targeted by the strikers, Jews opened a port in Tel Aviv.

In general, the Jewish community took measures to limit the damage to industry and agriculture caused by the general Arab strike. But the revolt, which lasted three years, nevertheless caused hardship and precipitated an economic crisis that ultimately influenced British mandatory policy.

In 1936, the British government established the Palestine Royal Commission, to address the underlying issues in the conflict between the Jews and the Arabs. The commission was known as the Peel Commission, after its chairman Lord William Robert Peel.

The commission arrived in Palestine, and after collecting various Arab and Jewish testimonies, resolved that the land should be divided between the two competing nations.

They drew a map of the division, where the Arabs received the lion's share of the land, and the Jews received a narrow strip hugging the coast. This plan was received with sharp opposition within the Yishuv. The Arabs refused to endorse it as well, claiming the entire land as their own.

The British mandatory power withdrew the proposal and changed its policies in favour of Arab claims. The new goal of the British government became to stop aliyah, and in the process, to stunt if not strangle the Yishuv. Great Britain's imperial interests led to a sharp turnaround in policy toward Jewish immigration to the land.

Ironically, on the day of Kristallnacht (Nov. 10, 1938), one of the most dire hours for Germany's Jews, the British government published the decisions of the Woodhead Commission, which outlined new British policy.

In an attempt to pacify the Jewish population, Britain proposed a conference in London, with participation from Jews and Arabs, to find a compromise. Thus, the Saint James Commission opened on Feb. 15, 1939. In a beautiful palace with lush gardens surrounding it, the representatives of the British government, the delegation of the Jewish Agency and Arab representatives sat around a large conference table.

In August 1939, the shadow of war could be felt by all

The pastoral surrounding was in sharp contrast to the tension felt by the Jewish representatives. The discussion centred around aliyah. The suggestions of the British government were rejected by both sides.

Sensing where the winds of British foreign policy were blowing, the Jewish delegation decided to leave the conference in protest on March 16, 1939.

They had no idea that the harshest blow was yet to come.

Two months later, on May 17, 1939, the British government published its famous White Paper aimed at completely stopping further development of the Yishuv in Palestine.

The White Paper decreed that a mere 75,000 Jews were to be allowed to immigrate to the Land of Israel over the next five years, and that sale of land to Jews in Palestine would be drastically limited. It also decreed that within 10 years, an independent state with an Arab majority would arise for the residents of Palestine.

Early pioneers of the Yishuv work the land.

The locking of the gates of aliyah threw the Jews of the Yishuv into a state of shock.

David Ben-Gurion, who later became the state's first prime minister, termed the White Paper the "Betrayal Paper." The Jews protested, but to no avail. The Zionist leaders were helpless to alter the bitter fate of European Jewry. Masses of persecuted Jews from Germany, Poland, Austria and other European lands were clamouring to enter the locked gates of Palestine. The closure of the Land of Israel at this most critical hour for European Jews sealed the fate of the Jewish refugees and would have far-reaching consequences for the Yishuv and the future development of the Land of Israel. It seemed that the great dream of creating a Jewish state had vanished.

After Kristallnacht, when Hitler's intentions were revealed to the entire world, panic took hold of the Jews of Germany. The leaders of the Yishuv and the heads of British Jewry applied great pressure on London to at least allow Jewish children in Germany to enter Palestine.

They asked that 10,000 Jewish children be allowed into Palestine. Because of the pressure of public opinion, the British government consented to bring 10,000 German Jewish children into Britain itself. The government was determined not to change its policy on Palestine.

Thus, from November 1938 until the outbreak of the war, close to 15,000 Jewish children (aged two to 17), from Germany, Austria and Czechoslovakia, were transported out of the Third Reich on the Kindertransports. In all, 10,000 children and youth were sent to Britain and 5,000 to Holland, Denmark, Sweden, Belgium and France. Children were also sent to Lithuania and Poland to await entry permits for immigration to Palestine. But when these countries were overrun, most of these children were caught up in the Nazis' net.

With the drastic changes in British policy, Jewish entry into mandatory Palestine in the form of illegal aliyah speedily increased.

After 1934, Jews arrived in Palestine without permits, many of them belonging to the Revisionist movement. And, with the publication of the White Paper in 1939, the Mossad for Aliyah B – clandestine immigration to Palestine – was founded by the Haganah, the pre-state paramilitary force, in conjunction with the Jewish Agency, to bring in illegal immigrants. The Mossad then began to secretly ferry Jews to Palestine by the thousands.

The British mandatory power made every effort to prevent Jews from landing on Palestine's shores, sending ships to patrol the length of the country. From 1934 to 1939, about 20,000 illegal immigrants on some 50 boats succeeded in finding haven in Palestine. After World War II broke out, illegal immigration continued, despite vigorous British efforts to stop it. Many thousands of Jews managed to land safely.

In the last days of August 1939, the shadow of war could be felt by everyone across Europe. Zionist youth groups in Europe in hachsharah camps (preparatory to joining kibbutzim) waited anxiously to receive their exit permits.

A number of Youth Aliyah groups were at the planning stage in their efforts to leave Germany and were also expecting imminent receipt of their travel permits. Eva Stern, the head of the Youth Aliyah office in London at the time, relates that on Aug. 29, two days before the Germans attacked Poland, terrible panic gripped the Youth Aliyah office.

They sensed the immediate risk to their plans and tried to get the children from Germany to Britain without delay. But the travel arrangements required guarantees from British organizations with regard to the housing of the children.

Stern urged the British Foreign Office to issue the permits immediately.

She received the following response: "Dear madam, do you not know that war is about to break out and that any border crossings will be stopped immediately?"

Precisely because of this, she pleaded, arrangements for the children had to be expedited. However, the British bureaucracy stubbornly stood in her way.

Happy New Year

The Yishuv was helpless to influence events in Europe

She then turned for assistance to Norman Bentwich, who served on the British Council for German Jewry. His advice was for her to proceed immediately, without hesitation, even without valid permits in hand. He promised to personally take the consequences.

The Youth Aliyah office in London began working around the clock on behalf of the children stranded in Berlin.

The group leader in Berlin took the children by train to Holland, where a ship to Britain awaited them. The train, however, was scheduled to arrive in Holland too late to catch the ship's departure. Stern then contacted a non-Jewish friend in Holland, Gertrude Weismuller, who organized a convoy of buses to take the children from the train station to the embarkation point. Weismuller also managed to delay the boat's departure until the buses arrived. The children arrived safely in Britain.

The 21st World Zionist Congress convened in August that year in Geneva, Switzerland, under a bleak and distressing atmosphere. The sessions were conducted in the dark shadow of approaching war.

One of the participants at the congress, Emmanuel Neuman, wrote the following: "The main session was conducted in the opera house of Geneva, a beautiful and impressive building. But across the square, delegates were engaged in equally important discussions. In a small restaurant, we talked about and weighed all the rumours that were spreading across Europe. No one knew where the next axe would fall and when the war would finally begin. The delegates roamed the halls speculating if and when the borders of their respective countries would close and if they would be able to return home. The congress thus conducted its business with great haste, before the lights went out in Europe, before travelling across international borders became too difficult and dangerous."

Jewish refugees evade the British blockade.

At the conclusion of the proceedings, Chaim Weizmann, the president of the World Zionist Organization, summed up the mood of the time: "A great darkness surrounds us. With a heavy heart, we take our leaves from each other... Who knows – perhaps a new light will soon shine down through those dark clouds... If we stay alive, and I hope we do, we will continue with our work. My heart swells in the hope that we will meet again in peace."

Congress participants left quickly and returned to their homes before the trumpets of war were sounded.

Although everyone was prepared for war, the announcement of Hitler's invasion of Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, hit the leaders of the Yishuv hard. They did not know how to cope with this new reality.

On the one hand, they heartily opposed the British regime; yet, on the other hand, they were prepared to use all their strength to fight the Nazis. David Ben-Gurion famously announced: "We must support the [British] army as though there were no White Paper, and fight the White Paper as though there were no war."

The Yishuv leadership called on Jewish youth to sign up with the British army to fight the Nazis. Thousands of Yishuv youth answered the call. Weizmann, a noted scientist who had helped the British during World War I, also offered his services to the British government.

Weizmann tried desperately to save Jews from Poland at the start of the war. After the invasion of Poland by the German army, he decided to act quickly to try to save as many Jewish children as he could before the Nazis overran the country. The Germans were quickly advancing upon Warsaw from the west, north and south. He called his contacts within the British government and offered a plan to transport 25,000 children from Poland to Palestine.

Given the drastic change in circumstances and the enthusiastic joining of the British war effort by the Jews of the Yishuv, he hoped that the British government would change its restrictive aliyah policies.

Even though the White Paper limited immigration to Palestine to 15,000 per year, there was a provision that enabled British authorities to admit 25,000 refugees immediately to mandatory Palestine if the high commissioner determined that the means were available to support them. The provision expressly stated that "Special consideration will be made for refugee children."

The government had included this clause in the White Paper as a means of countering the harsh criticism levelled at it for ignoring the tragic condition of the Jews of Europe.

Relying on the precise language of the White Paper itself, Weizmann pleaded for the immediate admission of the 25,000 Jewish children. Polish government officials he had contacted had already agreed to help. British authorities, however, reacted cautiously, and time quickly ran out. Warsaw fell to the Germans and Poland ceased to exist.

Weizmann's plan of rescue was deliberately foiled by British officials.

Thus, on Sept. 1, 1939, the Yishuv was at a very low point. Embroiled in a harsh conflict with the Arabs and handcuffed by the British mandatory power, the Yishuv was helpless to influence or ease the disastrous effect of the tragic events that were to unfold in Europe.

Jews transformed into devoted Soviet citizens by 1939

By ANNA SHTERNSHIS

"This is how to cook kosher pork, it is really quite easy," says Sara, an 82-year-old resident of Brooklyn, N.Y.

Sara was born in Derzazhnya, a small Jewish shtetl in Ukraine. She explains that Jewish religious laws that prohibit the consumption of pork do not matter to her, because "only a Jewish soul can make food kosher." Sara has never been inside a synagogue and does not celebrate any Jewish holidays. She cannot recite a single Jewish prayer. Yet, every year she commemorates the anniversary of the Russian Revolution on Nov. 7, New Year's Eve, and May Day (Soviet Labour Day).

Sara speaks fluent Yiddish with an authentic Ukrainian dialect, loves to read short stories by the famous Yiddish writer Sholem Rabinowitch, who is known as Sholom Aleichem, and enjoys singing Yiddish folk songs, especially the sentimental Papirosn (Cigarettes) by Herman Yablokoff. She was especially happy when her son took her to see a new production by the only Yiddish-language theatre in New York. Sara evaluates all the events of world history from the point of view: Is it good for the Jews or bad for the Jews?

Sholom Aleichem

Sara's identity is full of apparent contradictions. On the one hand, she is almost militantly negative toward Jewish religious traditions, but on the other hand, she is extremely attached to Yiddish language, songs, and especially theatre.

Sara's upbringing combined old Yiddish family traditions and Soviet cultural policies, which struggled against these family traditions. Her worldview has a distinct Jewish identity, but its characteristics are significantly different from the Jewish identities of comparable generations in other countries.

This is no surprise, of course, because she and millions of other Jews, who grew up in the Soviet Union before 1941, were subjected to one of the most effective state cultural engineering policies of the 20th century. The primary features of this culture, formed as a result of these policies, have remained unchanged for decades and have been consequently passed on to new generations of Soviet and even post-Soviet Jews.

The transformation of the Jewish population that took place between 1917 and 1939 was one of the most successful Soviet projects. By 1939, the Soviet Jews had been transformed from a relatively isolated, predominantly haredi minority into the most devoted group of Soviet citizens, who readily abandoned their religious identity and replaced it with complete commitment to the Soviet regime.

Rituals connected with the Jewish way of life, such as those of food consumption or wedding ceremonies, were subjected to massive physical attack. The shochtim were included by Soviet authorities in the category of lishentsy (persons deprived of civil rights). Thus, they were harassed, jailed, and deported. There was never an official prohibition of kosher slaughter itself in the Soviet Union, but its practice was made difficult.

The Soviet authorities also tried to close the mikvahs, Jewish ritual baths. Rather than explicitly objecting on religious grounds, they closed the bathhouses for ostensibly sanitary and hygienic reasons. Hundreds of rabbis and other clergymen were arrested or deported to remote provinces.

In the 1920s and 1930s, many Jewish believers protested against the closing of big synagogues. Viktor Kh., born in 1919 into an observant family in Pilyava, a little shtetl in Ukraine, shares the following story from his youth.

"I was 13, and my brother was 17 when we were enrolled to work in the collective farms. During Sabbath, however, my mother was praying. The Jewish chairman of the collective farm would come to our home and would wait until she finished her prayer. Then he would tell her: 'Madam Khamishon, please, I beg you, let your boys work.

There is so much work, we need them.' She would answer: 'Mr. Kogan, my boys do not work on Sabbath. They are not Komsomol [a Communist youth organization] members or Pioneers [Communist children's organization], and they are not going to work.'" She said they would never become Pioneers or Komsomol members.

Like Victor's mother, many Jewish parents did not want their children to be directly involved in anti-religious campaigns and even actively protested against it. Manya Landsman (born 1918) told me about the closure of a synagogue in her shtetl. Her father, the rabbi, who generally was not involved in his children's activities in school, was worried when 11-year-old Manya told him that on Saturday, her class in her Soviet Jewish school was given a task to go to a synagogue, find scrolls of Torah, and bring them to the school yard to be burned. Manya's father instructed her to find the Torah that belonged to their family, hide it under the clothes and bring it home. The girl did it, and the scroll is still one of the family's precious possessions.

Resistance, however, was not the only form of reaction to Soviet anti-religious policies. In fact, many Jews, especially younger ones, worried about having to observe religious rituals out of respect to their parents, and not about abandoning a tradition that they believed to be backward and irrelevant to contemporary times. Sonya G., born in 1927 in Ukraine, a daughter of a shochet, says that she dreaded Passover because she had to eat her matzah blintzes for lunch under the table in school, so that other kids could not see that she was eating kosher food. As soon as Sonya left home to study in a larger city, she never touched matzah or any other Jewish food again.

Joseph Stalin was responsible for the cultural engineering designed to suppress Jewish identity.

Many synagogues were closed by the regime. While some were used as storage places, factories or simply became abandoned, many others were transformed into Yiddish clubs and theatres in the 1930s. As a result, they still served as centres of leisure for Jews, at least in the places where Jews constituted the majority of the population.

The content of the former synagogues' activities changed dramatically, but the people who attended the events conducted there remained the same. In fact, reconstructed as clubs, the former synagogues attracted more people than ever – youngsters were involved in various workshops, adults would come to watch movies, amateur theatre performances and concerts by visiting artists.

Once the synagogue buildings were taken over, their appearance did not change dramatically. Lack of money prevented the alteration of synagogues to look more like clubs.

Thus, the Soviet club looked exactly like a synagogue with minor changes, which only tended to emphasize the Jewish character of an ostensibly Soviet club, recalls Efim G., a former resident of Parichi, Byelorussia (now Belarus).

"There was a Jewish club in Parichi since the beginning of the 1920s. This was a former synagogue building. Instead of the Holy Ark (Aron Kodesh), a "wonder" picture was hanging on the wall there. If one looked straight at the picture, one saw Karl Marx. If one looked at the picture from the left, one saw Lenin, and from the right side – Leon Trotsky."

Efim can sing a song about these portraits, using the tune of the famous Passover tune Chad Gadya. In fact, he did not know that this song was anything but a Soviet tune from his childhood, until he heard the performance of the original at a communal seder for Russian Jewish immigrants in Brooklyn in the 1990s.

Efim, Manya, Sonya, Sara and many other Ukrainian, Russian and Byelorussian Jews who were young adults in 1939 and are now scattered across the globe told me their stories in Yiddish. They know this language not only because their parents spoke it, but also because they were students in Soviet-sponsored Yiddish schools that existed between 1918 and 1939 in the Soviet Union. Designed as typical Soviet institutions, with a non-specifically Jewish curriculum, the schools conducted all instructions in Yiddish with the goal of delivering the messages of Soviet ideology to Jewish children in their mother tongue. More than 300,000 Jewish children, and some non-Jews went through these schools. While Yiddish schools lacked the prestige of the Russian-language and Ukrainian schools, they instilled a sort of Jewish pride and the knowledge of Yiddish language in their students.

Yiddish theatres, trade unions, cultural centres, publishing houses and research institutions, fully sponsored by the Soviet government, were established across the country in the 1920s. By 1937, it was decided that their mission had been completed, and most of them were shut down. Later, many members of the Soviet Jewish cultural elite were arrested and killed. Among them, perished Yiddish writers Moyshe Kulbak and Izya Harik. Only a handful of central Yiddish theatres, including the Moscow State Yiddish Theatre, survived the 1930s.

In 1939, of the three million Jews in the Soviet Union, 54 per cent declared Russian to be their mother tongue. By then, many Jews lived in larger cities, such as Moscow, Leningrad, Minsk and Kiev, and participated wholeheartedly in the creation of the new Soviet culture, free of religion. Eager and talented, Jewish youth who stormed Soviet universities in the 1920s quickly became the new Soviet elite, only too happy to abandon the Jewish culture with its religion, customs, and traditions. In their view, these traditions did not have a place in the Soviet society. In fact, these Jews became the most devoted group of Soviet citizens, fully ready to defend their country if necessary. They were first to volunteer in the Red Army once the Soviet Union became involved in World War II in 1941.

In the late 1930s, even observant Jews often believed that sacrificing religious observances was a worthwhile price to pay for the social mobility provided by the Soviet state. Such a view was confirmed by the fact that the Soviet authorities fiercely fought against popular anti-Semitism (the first government in Russian history to do so). By 1939, a public display of anti-Semitism could easily lead to imprisonment. (Then again, almost everything could during Stalin's Great Terror of 1937-39). It would seem that the Sovietization of Russian Jews was full and complete. But history showed otherwise.

In 1939, many things changed. The Soviet Union annexed eastern Poland and its Jews. The war and the Holocaust killed 1-1/2 million Soviet Jews. The after-war policies of the Soviet regime were harshest towards Jews. Restrictions were placed on the education that Jews could receive and on their career paths. Yiddish cultural institutions were finally closed, and no one could go to jail for being anti-Semitic.

But Soviet Jews managed to retain traces of their identity that were formed before the war. While their religious awareness was essentially non-existent, their cultural identity and love of Yiddish culture helped them to remain Jewish despite all historical odds and circumstances.

Anna Shternshis teaches at the University of Toronto. Her areas of research are Jewish culture in the Soviet Union, Jewish-Slavic cultural relations, Yiddish mass culture, theatre and music.

Canadian Jews faced poverty, anti-Semitism

By GERALD TULCHINSKY

Canadian Jewry in September 1939 had experienced 171 years of enormous growth and significant change, increasing from a mere handful of men when the first congregation was formed in Montreal in 1768 to nearly 140,000 scattered across the country.

The Census of Canada showed that from strictly mercantile beginnings, the community, countrywide, now included thousands of workers who toiled mainly in the clothing trades concentrated in the major cities. And while immigration had slowed to a trickle, the community was overwhelmingly composed of immigrants who had arrived less than a generation earlier. Their Yiddish, and for many, Hebrew too, culture, expressed through religious, political, social and literary venues, featured prominently, even while their Canadian-born sons and daughters strove for recognition and advancement in the English-speaking world of business and the professions. It was then, broadly speaking, a complex community of many partially separate components, in transition in a country undergoing its own significant economic, political and social transformations.

Canada in September 1939 had already undergone six years of the Great Depression, during which markets for its major exports had almost collapsed, while farming and manufacturing were in dire straits. Hundreds of thousands of people out of the population of 11 million were dependent on charity or public relief (now known as welfare), their livelihoods having disappeared, riding railway boxcars, begging for food or standing on the streets asking for handouts.

The great promise of economic bounty and population growth, forecast when then-prime minister Sir Wilfred Laurier had proclaimed that the 20th century would belong to Canada, now rang hollow as children went hungry, attended school in substandard clothing and lived in extremely poor conditions, often with such inadequate health care that many of them died young.

The Jewish economy suffered equally, especially the clothing trades where, as it was put, "business is so bad that even the customers who don't intend to pay aren't buying." Manufacturers in the previously burgeoning women's ready-to-wear sector were especially hit hard by unpredictable markets, style shifts, competition and ruthless buying practices of major national retailers.

Driven to the wall, many firms could not survive, and in the mortality rates, women's wear manufacturing was the highest of all Canadian industrial sectors. Meanwhile, small retailers were also feeling the pinch and many went under.

"When will you ship my order?" one retailer complained.

"When you pay my last invoice," came the reply.

"But I can't wait that long!"

Just as bad – if not worse because of the numbers affected – was the impact of the economy on the Jewish working class – the men, women and children who worked in an industry where long hours, low pay, filthy and often dangerous conditions and sexual harassment prevailed.

Unions tried to help, but no sooner were agreements with employees struck than they were broken. Layoffs, work stoppages and strikes sometimes occurred, with attendant picket line violence to stop "scab" labour that involved goon squads and strong arm tactics. Bitterness, uncertainty and tension plagued the Montreal, Toronto and Winnipeg fashion districts.

Outside of the large cities, Jewish life flourished in small cities and towns scattered across the broad Canadian landscape in places like Glace Bay, Sherbrooke, Brantford, Prince Albert and Victoria. Informed by the Congress and various Zionist organizations of Canada about the outside world, "small town Jews," as they called themselves, also kept abreast through the Yiddish papers, including those from New York and, where possible, the weekly radio programs like The Jewish Hour from Hamilton.

A shul, often started in a converted house, had begun, and a teacher/shochet/mohel/"rabbi" did his duties in the community of storekeepers, many of them formerly pedlars, now selling mens and womenswear, shoes, or hardware; some were junk men who canvassed the town for castoff metal, paper, rags, hides, glass and animal fat, which they collected in their "yards" and sold to brokers.

Iron and steel ended up in the blast furnaces of Sydney, Hamilton and Sault Ste. Marie, where it would be converted to armaments. A B'nai Brith lodge and a Hadassah-WIZO organization offered social and cultural outlets, while Young Judaea clubs flourished in these places where Jews lived close to non-Jewish neighbours and experienced a much quicker process of adjusting to the Canadian social context.

Meanwhile, the political scene was equally depressing. William Lyon Mackenzie King had returned to the Dominion prime ministership in 1935, defeating the Conservatives led by the authoritarian, pompous and seemingly unsympathetic Richard Bedford Bennett, whose main answer to the worsening Depression was work camps, the dole and borrowing from new U.S. president Franklin Delano Roosevelt. Hunger marches and protest demonstrations were put down with armed force, like the bloody Regina riot where the Mounties intervened to stop the "March on Ottawa," killing two and wounding dozens more.

But King had no better answers for the critics, though he tried to thwart some problems by appointing a royal commission, and, as the poet Frank Scott wrote, did "nothing by halves which can be done by quarters." In Alberta, a Social Credit government was elected, some of whose members expressed anti-Semitic ideas. In Quebec, the new Union Nationale government harboured some virulent anti-Semites while, more dangerously perhaps, Jew hatred had emerged in the budding nationalist movement – some of them proto-fascist – drawing in young student intellectuals like Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

Anti-Semitism, some of it imported from abroad, including German Nazism and much from the United States, was prevalent throughout the country by 1939, just as virulent and sometimes violent prejudices were directed at blacks, Asians, Ukrainians, Poles, Italians and other minorities. While Jews did not have a monopoly on suffering and while what they did have to endure in Canada those days was nothing in comparison to virulent outbreaks in Europe, it was painful enough. Restrictions, sometimes expressed in the most insulting terms, in employment, housing, recreation and educational opportunities made life difficult for many Jews of that era.

Notwithstanding discrimination and hard times, by 1939 Canadian Jewry had organized itself to respond. The Canadian Jewish Congress, defunct since first formed in 1919, was renewed in 1933 under new leadership. Finally, in 1939, through Montreal whisky tycoon Samuel Bronfman, a strong and committed president, who was well assisted by Saul Hayes, Congress made efforts to mitigate anti-Semitism (and soon racism generally) through education, outreach to liberals and "quiet diplomacy" during the 1930s. While certainly not overwhelmingly successful, it probably helped somewhat in alleviating a tense situation. Soon Congress would ally itself with B'nai Brith in forming the Joint Public Relations Committee to better combat prejudice, an effort which would register considerable success in the 1940s.

By Sept. 1, 1939, then, while Nazi Germany was about to attack Poland and send Europe into World War II, Canadian Jewry was part of a weak and troubled country that was unprepared for war, a nation of about 11 million, many of whom were still in deep mourning from the World War I loss of nearly 60,000 soldiers – sons, brothers, fathers – and over 138,000 wounded.

Canada was also a young country with fragmented politics, uncertain leadership, an exposed economy, ethnic and national tensions and many other problems. Looking ahead, the future looked dark, and after Canada and its Jews entered the war, which Parliament decided on Sept. 10, 1939, even darker days ensued, for which the past offered no guide or moral compass.

Gerald Tulchinsky is emeritus professor of history at Queen's University and the author of Canada's Jews: A People's Journey, published by the University of Toronto Press in 2008.

Les Juifs veulent boycotter le charbon allemand

Le Canadian Jewish Congress vient de prendre une nouvelle initiative: le boycottage du charbon allemand livré au Canada.

Il y a longtemps que les Juifs du Canada parlent de mettre à l'index tout ce qui vient d'Allemagne ou de pays dont l'économie évolue dans l'orbite de Berlin. Ces Juifs sont en train de mettre sur pied une organisation qui devrait fonctionner d'un jour à l'autre. Ils tiennent une assemblée demain soir à 681-685, rue des Communes pour s'entendre définitivement et lancer leur campagne.

Déjà les Juifs ont approché les importateurs et les distributeurs de charbon pour les mettre au fait de leur campagne. Ils allèguent que le charbon allemand cause un préjudice sérieux à celui qui vient des pays britanniques et que les bas prix du charbon allemand dénent considérablement la vente de tout autre charbon.

Au nombre des suggestions du Canadian Jewish Congress on note la recommandation d'indiquer, au port de Montréal, la provenance du charbon pour permettre à ceux qui sont en faveur du boycottage du charbon allemand de l'identifier et d'en acheter qui vient d'une autre provenance que de l'Allemagne.

Tel. PLateau 4841

MONTREAL, Sept. [illegible], 1939

CONFIDENTIAL, DEAR

Our enemies are insinuating that the Jews are not enlisting for military service in the present emergency.

It has become imperative that we know the actual facts, namely:

1. How many have enlisted in your community.
2. Which regiments have they joined.
3. What are their names and addresses, if at all known.

The Dominion Council of the Canadian Jewish Congress at an extraordinary session decided that a liaison registration office be opened to give information and to assist the recruiting of Jewish men.

We take it for granted that you appreciate the position in which Canadian Jewry is placed and that you will immediately comply with the above request.

Please let us hear from you by return mail.

Very truly yours,

H. M. Caiserman
General Secretary

More than 17,000 Canadian Jews served in WWII. This was approximately 10 percent of the Jewish population in Canada. It was also the largest percentage of any ethnic group then in Canada. [Document from Canadian Congress Charities Comission National Archives]

Human rights leaders get their priorities in order

By MICHAEL POSNER

And it came to pass that the venerable leaders of the world's most important human rights organizations assembled for their annual conclave in Geneva.

As they sat down to their evening repast of Scottish smoked salmon and duck confit, their faces were drawn and troubled – and understandably so.

Their diligent teams of researchers and investigators had catalogued a long list of grievous human rights abuses, evidence of the persistent cruelty of man to man.

The United Nations General Assembly

This high-minded gathering, men and women of unquestioned probity and integrity, had received disturbing reports on the atrocities committed in recent years by Russian forces in Chechnya, and later in Georgia, murdering scores of innocent civilians.

They had read the shocking accounts of genocide in Darfur, perpetrated by Janjaweed militias, agents of the Sudanese government – hundreds of thousands slaughtered indiscriminately.

They had seen the disturbing film footage of Chinese army soldiers killing Muslim Uighur protesters in Xinjiang and in Tibet.

They were aware that the military junta in Myanmar had deployed troops to assault thousands of protesting monks and students.

They knew that tribal warfare was being conducted in Somalia, an anarchic wasteland of gratuitous mayhem, where the death toll, again, climbed into the hundreds of thousands.

They bemoaned the tales of child soldiers – kidnapped, trained and coerced into warfare in Sierra Leone, Sri Lanka and several other countries. By some accounts, there were as many as 300,000 child soldiers fighting in various parts of the world, most of them under the age of 15.

Yet that was not all. These sober humanitarians, veritably the ethical and moral voice of the human race, knew only too well the heart-breaking stories of Pakistan villagers forced to flee – 1.7 million, according to the United Nations – the violence in Swat province, innocents caught up in the country's deadly war against Al Qaeda militants.

They had closely monitored the continuing struggle in neighbouring Afghanistan between Taliban insurgents and a coalition of Western forces trying to stabilize the Afghan president's tenuous hold on power.

They had followed the accounts of Iranian bloggers and Twitterers, as Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's special forces launched a brutal crackdown on those who dared to protest his landslide win in the 2009 national elections, and the intolerable constraints of a rigid theocratic state.

And they were scrupulous in gathering statistics on the daily toll of dead from suicide bombings, roadside ordinances and other acts of insurgency in strife-torn Iraq. The swelling archive of dossiers filled these pillars of the international community with concern.

The Jewish World

Brave men, women of conscience

But as they sipped their goblets of vintage French and German wines in Geneva, these brave men and women of conscience knew something else: that the aggregate suffering of all of these terrible wars, revolts, uprisings and protests paled in comparison to the single most pressing human rights issue of the day — indeed, of the century.

"Ladies and gentlemen," began the distinguished chairman of the proceedings, as he took the dais. "We cannot hope to deal with all the abuses that have been documented. Therefore, we must prioritize, must we not, and direct our energies to confronting the most egregious, the most flagrant encroachments: those carried out by the Jews – or rather by the Israelis, though it amounts to the same thing – against their peace-loving neighbours, the peace-loving Palestinians.

"All other infringements of fundamental human rights, pale beside that now being inflicted upon the peace-loving Palestinians.

"Please raise your hands if you agree that we humanitarians

Demonstrators in the Arab world protest the violation of human rights by the Israelis. /RNS/would be derelict in our duties as sentinels of civil liberty if we failed to speak the disturbing truth about the heinous acts perpetrated against the peace-loving Palestinians."

And lo, like an obedient army saluting its commander, the delegates promptly raised their hands in unanimous agreement.

"Yes, we know that a handful of peasants have complained about Russian fighter jets raining down missiles on towns and villages in Chechnya and Georgia," the distinguished chairman continued.

"But can we turn a blind eye to the plight of peace-loving Palestinians, forced to undergo hours of humiliating inspection at Israeli army checkpoints, simply because one or two of them might want to visit a pizza parlour in Jerusalem or a discotheque in Tel Aviv with an unfashionable belt tied around their waist?

"I think we all know the answer.

"Yes, the Sudanese government has armed and trained gangs of mercenaries, which have raped, pillaged and murdered tens of thousands. I therefore urgently call for a formal commission of inquiry under the auspices of the United Nations to hold hearings that will probe these grievous charges. We must get to the bottom of it.

"I don't care if it takes years.

"But what are the killing fields of Darfur when measured against the injustice of the vast, impersonal separation wall that has been erected along the border between what was once Palestine and the West Bank, and with which peace-loving Palestinians must now sadly contend?

"I think we all know the answer.

"Yes, it is said that the Sri Lankan government used disproportionate force in ruthlessly suppressing the Tamil uprising in the north. This claim, too, should be thoroughly investigated, as soon as time and resources permit.

"But what is this compared to the hardships peace-loving Palestinians must endure, watching a few Israeli settlers on the West Bank turn the arid desert into productive farms and communities, while incessantly singing Hebrew songs in praise of God?

"I think we all know the answer.

The heart of the matter

"Surely the world recognizes the menace – no, let us have the courage to call it by its proper name – the evil that these handfuls of settlers and their wives and small children pose to peace-loving Palestinians.

"Does anyone doubt that, but for these vexatious settlers – who believe that some hoary deity in a book of transparent fiction, the Old Testament, promised them the land – does anyone doubt that but for their obstinacy and intransigence, peace-loving Palestinians would immediately renounce terrorism, and teach their children to love the Jews?

"I think we all know the answer.

"It is not our role as humanitarians to pass judgment on the merits of this political position or that. We must always remain neutral and weigh our words carefully, until all the facts are in.

"But can there be any doubt that if only Israel would dismantle the settlements, tear down the apartheid wall, remove the checkpoints, return to its original borders, and allow peace-loving Palestinians everywhere to reclaim their ancestral homes that this festering conflict would finally be resolved?

"I think we all know the answer.

"If Israel did not unreasonably insist that peace-loving Palestinians finally come to terms with its existence, and grant it formal recognition – clearly an unreasonable demand – can anyone doubt that the elected representatives of Hamas, Fatah, Islamic Jihad and other peace-loving organizations would no longer be forced to take the billions of dollars in aid given to them over the past decade by American and European governments to buy guns, set up bomb-making factories, and open Swiss bank accounts for their families?

"I think we all know the answer to that, as well.

"And so my friends, I urge you today not to let your focus be diverted as another Shiite suicide bomber blows up a Sunni vegetable market or police training academy in Baghdad.

"Don't be distracted when elite forces of the Iranian government charge through the streets of Tehran shooting young Iranians at random.

"Don't take your eye off the ball when guns and water cannons are used on protestors in the streets of China and Myanmar.

"Because what is that compared to having to be searched and verbally assaulted by an Israeli soldier at a checkpoint near Ramallah?

"Surely we all know the answer.

"Yes, there are women being genitally mutilated every day in Africa, women prevented from going to school, leaving the matrimonial home without a male escort, forbidden to drive cars, wear sleeveless dresses and vote in elections.

"Yes, there are newly dead corpses lying in the streets of Somalia and elsewhere.

"Indeed, as I speak, there are men, women and children dying in unthinkable numbers all over the world, testimony to the rapacious, murderous instinct that seems to reside in all mankind. It is too horrible to even contemplate.

"So let us maintain our reason and perspective. Let us be strong and vigilant. Let us be mindful of the greater tragedy, the greater sin, the one that occurs when – on a mere pretext, because a young Arab may have killed a few dozen Jews in a suicide attack – another Israeli settler takes another sharpened axe to another peace-loving Palestinian olive tree and cuts it down, depriving him of his peace-loving livelihood. Think of the consequences of that.

"Isn't that, fundamentally the heart of the matter – the settlers, the Israelis, the Jews, if you will? Isn't that, in fact, the core of all our problems?

"I think we all know the answer to that."

And with that, the distinguished chairman stepped back from the lectern, while the sea of delegates rose as one to give him a sustained standing ovation.

Michael Posner writes for the Globe and Mail

5769 in review: war in Gaza, Bibi returns, Iran threat looms

BY LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

For Israel, the Jewish year 5769 was dominated by two events with far-reaching regional repercussions: the return of Benjamin Netanyahu as prime minister and the 22-day military operation against Hamas in Gaza.

Although Netanyahu's Likud won one seat less than former Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni's Kadima in the Feb. 10 election, the right-wing bloc of parties that supported Netanyahu's candidacy captured 65 of the 120 Knesset seats in the vote. This enabled Netanyahu to form a 74-member coalition, with Yisrael

Beiteinu, Labor, Shas, United Torah Judaism and Jewish Home joining Likud.

Sworn in on March 31, the new government immediately signalled reservations about the two-state model for peace with the Palestinians. But under strong pressure from Washington, Netanyahu quickly shifted. In a major policy speech at Bar-Ilan University on June 14, he committed his government to the notion of an independent Palestinian state alongside Israel.

"In my vision of peace, there are two free peoples living side by side on this small land, with good neighbourly relations and mutual respect, each with its flag, anthem and government, with neither threatening its neighbour's security and existence," he declared.

Still, Netanyahu attached strong caveats: the Palestinian state would have to be demilitarized, the Palestinians would have to recognize Israel as a Jewish state, no Palestinian refugees would return to Israel proper and Jerusalem would not be divided.

It was a far cry from the sweeping offer articulated by outgoing Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in the waning days of his administration. According to Olmert, in September 2008 he proposed handing over approximately 93.6 per cent of the West Bank to the Palestinians, compensating for the remaining 6.4 per cent or so in a land swap and a land corridor connecting the West Bank and Gaza.

Under the plan, a "very small" number of refugees would be allowed to return to Israel proper (about 2,000 a year for 10 years), Arab neighbourhoods in Jerusalem would go to Palestine and Jewish neighbourhoods would stay in Israel, and a special regime would run Jerusalem's Old City until details of a solution were worked out.

Israel responded to escalated rocket fire

Olmert even gave Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas a map reflecting the territorial proposal on the understanding that Abbas would respond within a few days.

Abbas never did.

The major change in the peacemaking equation this year was the inauguration of a new American president intent on renewing U.S. focus on bringing about Middle East peace.

President Barack Obama saw in a comprehensive U.S.-brokered Israeli-Arab peace agreement the key to regional stability, enhanced U.S. prestige and a reduction of Iranian influence in the Arab and Muslim worlds.

Special U.S. Middle East envoy George Mitchell made frequent trips to the region in an intense effort to set up productive peacemaking channels on both the Palestinian and Syrian tracks, and between Israel and the rest of the Arab world.

To create a positive atmosphere for peacemaking and to convince the Arab world of America's even-handedness, the White House put heavy pressure on Israel to freeze all construction in Jewish settlements, rankling many in Israel. The administration also urged moderate Arab states to take initial small steps toward normalizing relations with Israel. But as the Jewish year drew to a close, there was still no sign of reaching the freeze-for-normalization deal the Americans were seeking as a prelude to serious peacemaking.

Among several problems, Israel wanted some exceptions to the freeze to allow for limited natural growth in the settlements, the Saudis rejected U.S. requests for steps toward normalization and the Palestinians remained paralyzed by Hamas' continued rule over Gaza.

Indeed, earlier Israeli-Palestinian peacemaking efforts broke down when weeks of tension over the renewal of an informal ceasefire between Israel and Hamas escalated into a full-blown war in late December.

After months of escalated Hamas rocket fire into Israeli towns and cities, the Israel Air Force launched devastating bombing raids in Gaza beginning Dec. 27. The operation, called Cast Lead, would last more than three weeks and involve Israeli ground troops, ending on the eve of Obama's inauguration.

The Jewish World

A rare setback for Iran

By war's end, Palestinian sources said 1,417 Palestinians had been killed, 962 of them non-combatants Israel put the Palestinian death toll at 1,166 and identified 709 as militiamen and another 162 as combat-aged males. Israel suffered 13 dead, including three civilians killed by rocket fire

The disproportionate death toll and the widespread destruction in Gaza led to claims that the Israel Defence Forces' response to Hamas rocket attacks had been disproportionate and indiscriminate.

The debate extended into the summer with the release of numerous reports about the brief war.

Israel argued that its soldiers operated strictly within the laws of war and that strenuous efforts had been made to warn civilians of impending attacks.

The UN Human Rights Council established a fact-finding commission under South African Judge Richard Goldstone that heard testimony mainly from Palestinians. Israel refused to co-operate, claiming the commission's mandate was inherently biased.

In late July, the Israeli Foreign Ministry issued a 164-page rejection of claims made against it by groups such as Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International. The report found that "Israel's resort to force in the Gaza operation was both a necessary and a proportionate response" to the more than 12,000 rockets and mortars fired by Gaza militants between 2000 and December 2008. It also said that Israel was conducting its own investigation of about 100 alleged violations by soldiers in the field and had opened 13 criminal probes.

From an Israeli point of view, the Gaza operation had two major implications. Although it hurt Israel's image overseas, the operation appeared to establish a strong deterrent balance, at least in the short term. Six months after the war, rocket fire from Gaza had nearly stopped, and Israel and Hamas were negotiating a deal behind the scenes for the release of captured IDF soldier Gilad Schalit that would include opening border crossing points into Gaza.

The Gaza operation also marked a rare setback for Iran and its proxies in Gaza, further unifying relative Arab moderates such as Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Jordan and some Gulf states against Iran's nuclear weapons' drive.

For Netanyahu, stopping Iran from going nuclear remained a historical imperative in 5769. Israeli officials both under Olmert and Netanyahu made frequent trips to Washington to press the issue, and in late July a parade of top U.S. officials went to Jerusalem to coordinate policy on the issue.

Netanyahu's other major preoccupation in 5769 was dealing with the impact on Israel of the global economic crisis. He passed a two-year budget with increased government spending to counteract growing unemployment, and the Bank of Israel lowered interest rates to encourage business activity.

By mid-summer the economy was showing some signs of a recovery, including strong gains on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange, where the main indexes were up by 45 to 57 per cent over the lows of December 2008. One of the main worrying factors, however, was a rise in the national debt-to-GNP ratio, which was projected for the end of 2009 to be at 84 to 84.4 per cent, up from 78.3 per cent at the end of 2008.

Netanyahu faces an "offer he can't refuse"

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

"Settlement freeze in exchange for Iran sanctions" – that was the theme of a recent article published in the British Guardian in advance of Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's meeting with U.S. envoy George Mitchell in London later that day.

The two discussed the anticipated announcement next month by U.S. President Barack Obama of the imminent renewal of Israeli-Palestinian negotiations, as well as the topics of construction in West Bank settlements and gestures from Arab states toward normalization with Israel. The issue of Iran's nuclear program, however, hovered in the background of their meeting.

After the rhetorical flourishes have been stripped from Obama's gesture – the talk of peace and quotations from the Qur'an – his strategic purpose is laid bare: the formation of a regional coalition against Iran, led by the United States and with the participation of Israel, the Palestinian Authority (PA), Egypt, Jordan, Morocco, Saudi Arabia and the small Gulf states.

Every member will have to contribute something: the United States, the diplomatic cover and military umbrella; Israel, the removal of checkpoints and a freeze on building in West Bank settlements; the PA, the renewal of peace talks; Egypt and Saudi Arabia, intra-Arab legitimacy. The Gulf and Maghreb states are to agree to an Israeli diplomatic presence on their soil and overflights by El Al Airlines in their skies. The discussion is about the details – the scope of the construction freeze and the normalization – not the essence.

The link between the settlements and Iran's nuclear program cannot be taken for granted. Even if not a single new apartment is built in Ariel, Psagot or Ma'ale Levona, and even if all the settlements are dismantled, this will not stop the spinning of the centrifuges at the Natanz uranium enrichment facility.

Israel needs American backup regarding Iran

The opposite is also true: the elimination of Iran's nuclear program, or even the collapse of Iran's Islamic regime and its replacement with a pro-western, pro-Zionist government will not end the conflict over the Land of Israel.

The absence of a direct causal relationship, however, does not mean that there is no connection. There is a big connection due to the strategic interests of the parties. Iran exploits the Israeli-Arab conflict to bolster its aspirations for regional hegemony.

The United States needs to show that it is getting something from Israel for the Palestinians to win Arab agreement for its measures against the Iranians. Netanyahu will find it easier to make concessions in the West Bank if he can convince the Israeli public that such a move will delay the existential threat to the state that would be posed by an Iranian nuclear bomb.

Topping Netanyahu's concerns is the nuclear threat to Israel from Iran, perhaps followed by other states in the region that might try to emulate the Islamic Republic. The prime minister emphasized this in his meeting with Obama in May, which focused on the Iranian threat.

Netanyahu would rather have the U.S. deal with the threat to Israel than be forced into taking military action himself. Obama, hearing this message, was quick to exact a price in the form of a demand to freeze construction in the settlements. Netanyahu must restrict "the Jews' right to live in every place in Greater Israel" so that Obama will thwart "Iran's right to a nuclear program." Together, Netanyahu and Obama will rein in the dreams of the Israeli right and of the Iranian clerics.

The Obama administration views softening the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as a strategic interest of the United States, which after years of crisis is seeking to repair its position and regain its influence in the Middle East. Israeli dependence on the United States means that when Washington makes its interests clear, Jerusalem obeys. That is how it has always been, ever since Prime Minister David Ben-Gurion gave in to President Harry Truman's demand and stopped the Israel Defense Forces from invading Sinai at the end of the War of Independence.

Israel has disobeyed the United States and emerged unscathed only when the Americans were less determined than the Israelis were intransigent – for example, regarding the establishment of the nuclear reactor in Dimona and the 42 years of Jewish settlement in the territories.

In the confrontation with Iran, Israel needs American backing because of the power balance: Iran has 80 times the land mass and nine times the population of Israel. If Netanyahu decides to attack the country's nuclear installations, American force will be essential to balance the gap in resources.

The Israeli discussion of possible war with Iran focuses on the tactical question of the ability of the Israel Air Force to hit the sites and inflict enough damage to stop the nuclear program, or at least set it back by many years. It is assumed that Iran would respond with Shahab missiles on Tel Aviv and Dimona and Hezbollah-fired rockets from Lebanon. The question is whether this is a price worth paying to eliminate the atomic danger.

This is an incomplete, shortsighted view of the problem. Military plans focus on the immediate mission and tend to obfuscate the long-term implications.

In The Guns of August, historian Barbara Tuchman wrote that the military planners from all the belligerents in Europe on the eve of World War I assumed that the fighting would end within three or four months at most. Their plans ignored the possibility of a bloody war of attrition that would go on for years in the absence of a swift and decisive victory. They certainly never imagined a global war that ended up killing tens of millions and led to the redrawing of the map of Europe.

Something similar, albeit of far more modest dimensions, happened to the IDF when, in the summer of 2006, it prepared for a retaliatory action in Lebanon, not for a war with Hezbollah that dragged on for five weeks.

A danger of this sort awaits Israel if it embarks on a war against Iran. It is easy to be tempted by the prospect of victory in a spectacular aerial operation; the problems start after the planes "return safely to their bases."

Japan struck America at Pearl Harbor, but the balance of power was not in its favour. America recovered, armed itself and demolished the Japanese empire. As Edward Luttwak, one of the world's leading experts on strategy, wrote, it would have been better for the Japanese had their pilots gone astray on the way to Hawaii or missed the targets. In Strategy: The Logic of War and Peace, Luttwak wrote: "...the true strategic value of the tremendous tactical and operational success of the Pearl Harbor attack...was pure loss."

Israel destroyed the Egyptian air force in "three hours in June" in 1967, enabling the conquest of Sinai in four days. But Egypt is much larger than Israel, and it succeeded in recovering its territory with a limited military operation and a broad diplomatic one. Israel paid for its failed attempt to maintain its hold on the desert and to settle it with thousands of fatalities and tremendous economic damage.

Iran poses a difficult dilemma for Israel: if it does nothing, it will have to live in the shadow of a nuclear bomb in the hands of Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, and perhaps other rulers in the region. But if Israel does go to war against Iran, it risks years of hostilities, and even if it wins on points the price will be unbearably high.

The Iranian army today is inferior to the IDF in terms of firepower and range of action, but a large country can recover, organize itself and find the enemy's weak point – just as Egyptian President Anwar Sadat did in the Yom Kippur War.

To redress its inferiority in the overall balance of power vis-a-vis Iran, Israel needs American backing in military support and weapons supply, in intelligence and deterrent umbrellas and also in diplomatic support in the UN Security Council and vis-a-vis the Arabs and the Europeans, as well as economic support.

The sanctions the Obama administration is planning against the Iranian economy might not stop the centrifuges immediately. Iran will be able to make a bit more effort and build a bomb or two, even if it has difficulty importing gas and heating oil and its banks' credit is frozen. But if the sanctions are enforced seriously, they will make it difficult for Iran to wage a lengthy war against Israel (or the United States, or both). Perhaps the sanctions will even deter the Iranians from the thought of a war of attrition, even though someone will always be found to provide them with weapons and goods secretly (as Israel did in the Iran-Iraq War).

And what will Israel give in return? Until now, the price of American support for Israel has been fixed: concessions to the Arabs in the peace process. Withdrawal from Sinai and from Quneitra in the Golan Heights in return for the American airlift in the Yom Kippur War. Attending the Madrid conference in 1991, contrary to Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's principles in return for the Patriot missiles that were deployed in Israel during the Gulf War. Accepting the road map and a Palestinian state in return for wiping out Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and eliminating the "eastern front" in 2003.

The circumstantial evidence also suggests a link between the bombing of the Syrian reactor in 2007 and the renewal of the peace process with the Palestinians. The administration of President George W. Bush reported to Congress that Israel consulted with it before the attack and made it clear that the secret installation Syria had built near the Euphrates River was an "existential threat" that had to be destroyed.

American officials have admitted to giving tacit consent. According to an article in one U.S. professional journal, they also assisted with electronic warfare. Seven weeks after the reactor was destroyed, Bush convened the Annapolis summit. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert withdrew his previous objection to negotiations on a shelf agreement and came to the summit. Did the American position on the Syrian issue push Olmert to change his position on the Palestinian issue?

Now Netanyahu faces the same sort of offer he can't refuse: he wants American backing on Iran and knows he must pay for it through the settlements. The question is about the overall price, and about how much of it will be cash down – in a freeze on construction now – and how much in installments, in future concessions as part of a broader agreement.

The ancillary question is how Obama will help Netanyahu to explain the strategic equation of the settlements and Iran's nuclear installations to the Israeli public and to the right-wingers in his coalition.

Book documents flight of wartime Jews

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Of the three million or so Jews who survived the Holocaust, the majority did so by fleeing the danger beforehand. With good fortune, fortitude and foresight, they managed to stay a step ahead of the annihilation that would have awaited them.

Flight From The Reich, Refugee Jews 1933-1946 (Norton) by Deborah Dwork and Robert Jan van Pelt, a professor at University of Waterloo, is a well-researched and documented chronological account of people who were lucky enough to have fled, either legally or clandestinely, from the Nazis.

The book is divided into four parts, each documenting a specific time period. Each part is further subdivided into sections that, in addition to the historical narrative, add colour by describing the people who escaped, the legal hurdles placed in their way, the places they escaped to and the problems they faced in their new adopted home.

Jews started emigrating from Germany on the heels of Adolf Hitler's rise to power in 1933. But at the time, there was no sense of urgency. Many Jews believed that the situation was only temporary and that the Nazis would cast aside their anti-Semitism and get on with the more pressing business of running the country. Certainly none of them foresaw the Holocaust.

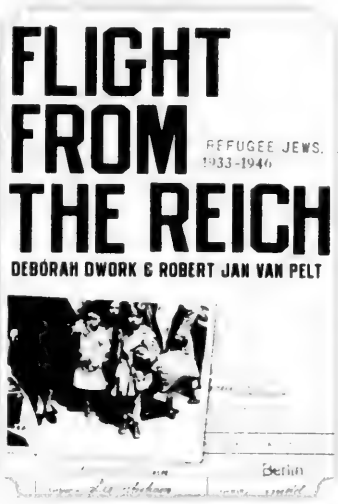
But that all changed by Kristallnacht, Nov. 9, 1938, and urgent emigration really started.

The Nazi government was eager to let Jews leave when they could, especially since they taxed the would-be emigrants heavily.

But visas were hard to get, and certain legal technicalities complicated issues. Because the Jews were technically German, refugee laws, created in part to deal with the stateless refugees following World War I, did not apply to them.

Getting people out of Germany and Austria was one thing. Finding where to put them was another. Ideas were tossed around, including Alaska, Angola, British Guinea, Birobidzhan, Madagascar and the Dominican Republic.

Many German Jews, desperate now, started to see Palestine as a refuge. Though the pioneering lifestyle may have appealed to German youths, the rich professionals who moved there found it incredibly hard to adjust.



Strict immigration quotas imposed by the British, and high absorption costs, made it tough for even those who wanted to immigrate there.

Even poor, desolate Shanghai became an option, which according to 19th-century agreements had no right to refuse European immigrants as long as they paid a set fee.

There is little if anything left out in this book. The writers, who in addition to their own books, previously collaborated on Holocaust. A History and Auschwitz, write about the tear-jerking scenes at the railway stations during the Kindertransports (by which more than 10,000 children were saved), the skills training programs set up in Germany to increase employability for youths going to Britain or Palestine, and the problems people faced obtaining visas.

As we approach the High Holidays, it is an opportunity to gather with our families and reflect on our actions and inactions, and the aspirations we had and those we forgot about because of difficulties.

While the Holidays are the same each year, each year we are different. Each year, we experience the Holidays differently.

Rosh Hoshanah celebrates our tradition. It's a reaffirmation of the Almighty's mercy, glory and love. Yom Kippur is a time for repentance and a time to ask for forgiveness.

In these days of reflection, prayer and sorrow for our entire people, let's not forget the trying circumstances, the difficult times in Israel. Our support for the State of Israel will always be strong and everlasting.

May our prayers have meaning, passion and greatness. May our prayers for our families and for the State of Israel, and for the world be heard – and may we be granted health, prosperity and fulfilment along with blessing and peace.

My wife Maida and our family, join with the National Executive Committee of Maccabi Canada, our athletes, coaches, volunteers and the hundreds of people who support the development of young Jewish athletes throughout Canada, in extending sincere best wishes for a Happy and Healthy New Year.

When the war came, opportunities to leave ended

America closed its doors to Jewish refugees unless a potential émigré could get an affidavit from an American relative. Britain went so far as to slap a visa obligation on anyone with a German or Austrian passport, in order to limit the "incoming hordes."

Middle-class young Jewish women learned household duties so as to qualify for one of the 14,000 spots allowed for Jews to enter Britain as domestics.

The Jewish Agency persuaded the British to allow a number of Jewish youths to enter Palestine under the Youth Aliyah program. In fact, getting youths out of Germany was a priority. The authors say that 83 per cent of Jews under the age of 24 left Germany by 1939.

In 1938, after the Anschluss – the political union of Germany and Austria after Hitler annexed the latter – the Inter-Governmental Committee was formed to co-operate with the Germans and facilitate, with the help of financial aid from the worldwide Jewish community, the emigration of German Jews. While somewhat effective, the program was criticized as caving into blackmail and extortion. (The Nazi government was paid for each Jew it released).

When war came, opportunities to leave were ended, and even those who obtained visas could no longer leave.

This book could easily be bogged down by numbers, statistics and legal discourse. While it provides all this necessary background information, its strength lies in focusing on individual stories.

I was particularly intrigued by the case of Elizabeth Luz. Luz, a middle-aged woman in Switzerland, undertook an extensive postal service from 1939 to 1945 to connect German-Jewish refugees with their families.

Parents in Germany would send her letters addressed to "Tante Elizabeth," as if she were the recipient. Luz painstakingly copied these letters in her own handwriting and sent them to the real addressees, as if they were her own nephews and nieces.

Thus, anxious parents in Germany were able to communicate with their children in Britain or elsewhere.

One cannot underestimate the importance of letters, especially in this pre-Internet age. No one who received letters necessarily cared what was said, as long as they received word, which meant that their loved one was still alive.

Luz was writing on average at least two letters a day. She also became a therapist and counsellor to parents unable to contact their children and vice versa when they wrote to her with their worries.

It is stories like this that make Flight From the Reich a moving as well as an informative book to read.

New generation seeks to reclaim Sephardi cultural roots

By AMY KLEIN
JTA

HOBOKEN, N.J. – Daniel Saks' crazy black curls bounce on stage with him to the wiry, deafening sound of guitars, horns and drums as the front man for DeLeon – an indie rock band with 15th century Spanish influences infused with cadences of the ancient Sephardic tradition – belts out plaintive tunes in English, Hebrew, Spanish and Ladino.

For the most part, the 150 twenty-something hipsters dancing to DeLeon's music at Maxwell's Lounge, 20 minutes from Manhattan, have no idea what the songs mean. It doesn't seem to matter.

"It wasn't a Ladino-fluent crowd," Saks jokes after the show, referring to the Judeo-Spanish language from the Middle Ages. "I think people can get past the language barrier. In a place like New York City, we're acclimated to hearing music in foreign languages."

Saks grew up near Washington listening to Sephardi music played by his mother, whose family lived in Italy for centuries after the expulsion from Spain before coming to the United States.

Years later he would name his band after his great-grandfather Giorgio DeLeon and philosopher Moses DeLeon. With its haunting melodies and the Spanish timeless themes of love, God and murder, he thought the music "held up well, better than most songs." He knew there were plenty of people recording traditional music, but "I thought I could bring it to my peers and bring new light to them."

DeLeon is part of a new crop of modern Jewish artists drawing on their Sephardi roots – from Spain and Portugal to Morocco, Iran and Syria to India and Greece. Many of those Jewish communities, although not all, were created by Jews who left Spain following the Inquisition, when they were ordered to convert or leave the country by July 31, 1492 (Tisha B'Av of that year).

Now, more than five centuries later, dozens of musicians, writers, poets, playwrights, filmmakers, historians, educators and chefs are reclaiming that culture to create a veritable Sephardi renaissance.

Many artists mime Sephardi culture because they want to popularize a lesser-known Jewish heritage.

"People who came from Poland stick together, and they are not so interested in the people who come from Morocco or Spain," says Nathalie Soussana, arranger of Songs From The Garden Of Eden: Jewish Lullabies And Nursery Rhymes, a book and CD of songs in Hebrew, Arabic and Spanish, including Y'aommi Yamali, an Algerian lullaby in Arabic whose words mean "King of the Home/May God touch you and lift up your soul."

Soussana wanted something that reflected her own mottled family – originally from Morocco, living in France, with an uncle and his wife from Turkey, an aunt married to an Ashkenazi and family members in Israel.

"I think that it's like that for a lot of Jewish families," she says.

One might not know that from seeing the history of Jewish culture in America.

Sephardi resurgence in Israel has fueled a wider movement

"Jewishness has tacitly been assumed to be synonymous with Germanic or Eastern European descent," Aviva Ben-Ur writes in the new book Sephardic Jews in America: A Diasporic History (New York University Press, 2009). "What began at the turn of the 20th century as denial of shared ethnicity and religion (whereby Ashkenazim failed to recognize Sephardim as fellow Jews) continues today in textbooks, articles, documentaries, films and popular awareness. More often than not, Sephardi Jews are simply absent from any sort of portrayal of the American Jewish community."

Ben-Ur prefers the term non-Ashkenazic Jews, dividing those called Sephardim into three groups: Sephardi Jews (Spanish and Portuguese-speaking Jews of Western Europe and Ladino-speaking Jews of the Ottoman empire); Mizrahi Jews (Arabic-speaking Jews native to the Middle East and Western Asia) and Romaniotes (Greek-speaking Jews native to the Byzantine Empire).

"In America there was Fiddler on the Roof and gefilte fish and Orthodox and Conservative and Reform Judaism," says Rabbi Daniel Bouskila of Sephardic Temple Tifereth Israel in Los Angeles. The various non-Ashkenazic groups "had every desire to be American when it came to living their lives, but in terms of their Judaism, they didn't have much interest in assimilating into the American Jewish community."

That's why Sephardim formed their own synagogues like Tifereth Israel (founded by a small group of Sephardi, Ladino-speaking immigrants in 1920) or more recently the Sephardic Cultural Center in Scottsdale, Ariz., both with congregants from communities such as Iraq, Iran, Morocco, Algeria, Tunisia, Libya, Egypt, Syria, Lebanon, Iran, Yemen, Brazil and Israel.

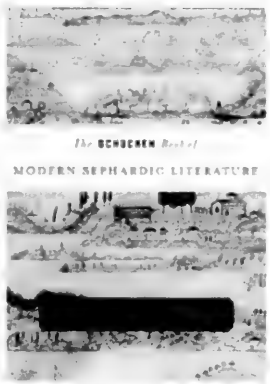
Bouskila believes that a Sephardi resurgence in Israel has fueled a wider movement in America and around the world.

"Once upon a time there was one definition of being Israeli – the prototypical Sabra being from Europe had blond hair and listened to a particular kind of music – I think that's changed in Israel," he says, citing the pop stars Sarit Hadad, Eyal Golan and Israel's first Idol winner, Maya Bouskila (no relation). "There's a unique sense of cultural identity through music and even names" – people don't "Hebraicize" their Sephardi names as much.

It has "spilled over" to America, Bouskila adds.

"I think people feel more secure in their identity today than they did a long time ago," he says.

For some artists, exploring Sephardi culture is a way to explore their own Jewish identity. Sephardim account for 3 to 4 per cent of the Jewish population in the United States.



"The communities that people live in before were so much more closed, and you were only defined by one thing," says Vanessa Paloma, a singer and scholar who specializes in Sephardi women's songs like Mose de Salio de Misrayim, a Ladino song about the burning bush and Moses' journey from Egypt, which women would sing at Passover.

For Paloma, being American means having many different identities – actor, writer, yogi, etc.

"It's like we're hungry for some kind of deeper meaning and these roots and where we came from," she says.

Now Paloma is living in Morocco where she can investigate her past.

"What did my grandmother sing? What kind of smells did she smell?" she wonders. "If I know more about that, I know more about my ancestors and know more about myself."

Others want to preserve a culture they fear might be lost.

The Jewish World

The need to understand important part of Jewish history

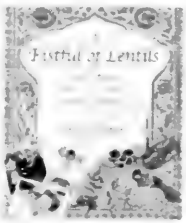
"I just thought about writing my family story – it's a very eccentric, eclectic family," novelist Gina Nahai says of the beginning of her journey writing fiction based on the Persian Jewish community in Iran and Los Angeles. When she began her seven years of research for her first novel, Cry of the Peacock, she saw that there was barely anything written about the community or its history.



Iranian Jews make up "the oldest Jewish community in the Diaspora, and no one had recorded their stories," she says. "And it didn't look like people were going to survive."

Many artists may be teaching their culture to their own people.

Jennifer Abadi, author of the cookbook-memoir A Fistful of Lentils: Syrian-Jewish Recipes from Grandma Fritzie's Kitchen (Harvard Common Press 2007), was surprised to find that many students in her classes were Syrian women who grew up eating food prepared by their mothers and housekeepers but had not learned to cook it.

"All of a sudden they get married to Syrian men, and it's expected [for them to cook Syrian food] and they have to go to their mothers and aunts," Abadi says, adding later, "so the book does provide a service." She says her audience also is Ashkenazi women "who like what they consider "better" Jewish food."

That's why many artists are mining Sephardi culture – because they like it. Majadrah (rice with lentils) might be better than kugel, and DeLeon "might be cooler than klezmer," jokes Jacob Harris, the chief operating officer of JDub Records, which produces both DeLeon and Songs From The Garden Of Eden.

JDub wasn't seeking out Sephardi artists per se, Harris says, but wanted "to promote authentic Jewish culture within the mainstream." And the mainstream likes world music.

"I don't think it's an accident that it's become so popular now – we are becoming more global, seeing Jewish history in a broader way," says Ilan Stavans, editor of The Schocken Book of Modern Sephardic Literature (Schocken, 2005), an anthology that includes fiction, memoirs, essays and poetry from 28 writers over 150 years, including a short story by Cuban-Jewish writer Ruth Behar titled Never Marry a Man Who Doesn't Beat You." The Jewish community is increasingly heterogeneous, not only politically but ethnically. People come from different parts of the world through immigration and mixed marriages, and they are pushing the collective identity in different ways," Stavans says, including contributions from Asian and Hispanic cultures. "The need to understand the Sephardim is to understand a very important part of Jewish history."

'You admire their ability to keep identity across time and space'

No longer does Jewish identity have to be "the standard flagpoles of Israel, the Holocaust and the shtetl," he says.

Yet even the term "Sephardi Renaissance" can be seen as Ashkenazi-centric; after all, these cultures have been flourishing for centuries, even if invisible to Ashkenazim.

"We live our religion – there is no resurgence," says Sheila Schweky, the program chair for the Sephardic Community Center in Brooklyn, N.Y., a JCC-like institution that serves 50,000 to 70,000 Jews – mostly Syrian, but also Egyptian, Iraqi, Moroccan and others.

Schweky cites the strong family ties and tight-knit community for preserving the Syrian Jewish heritage.

"As far as our traditions and customs, they're basically the same as when our fathers came here," she says, so the idea of a "renaissance" doesn't apply. "We don't turn around and say we have to teach our children our heritage – they live it."

Many tight-knit Sephardi communities that have thrived but remained nearly invisible to the rest of the world are learning that art can sometimes show less than positive portrayals. The Syrian Jewish community, for example, was not happy with David Adjmi's Stunning, a recent Off-Off-Broadway play that the New York Times called "a stinging portrait of an insular Syrian Jewish community in contemporary Brooklyn."

"Smaller communities think that everyone is going to judge everyone by that one play," the novelist Nahai says. "People overreact – it's not like every time you meet a Greek person you think of My Big Fat Greek Wedding."

On the one hand, people like seeing their community portrayed.

"So many young people write to me and tell me finally I can understand why my family is the way they are," Nahai says.

Others, however, become upset at some of the issues she raises, such as the treatment of women in the Persian Jewish community or how the rabbis were not always just.

"All novelists need to tell the truth. It doesn't mean it's the only reality, it doesn't mean I'm trying to capture the entire population," Nahai says. "Telling the truth is the only thing I have a responsibility to do. The rest a publicist needs to do."

Perhaps the Sephardi communities will become accustomed to the spotlight – and the good and bad lights shone on them.

"It's interesting that this is happening now," Stavans says. "It's because the Ashkenazi community is really solid, and it can look into other aspects of Jewish life without feeling threatened."

What they are seeing from Sephardi culture, in all its multiplicity and history, is that Sephardim "are more ethnic and more attractive in close-knit families that traveled across time and kept their identity," he says.

"At a time when it's very easy to lose one's identity, you admire their ability to keep their identity across time and space," Stavans says. "You feel an allure to Sephardi culture."

Israelis intern at Vancouver law firms

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — Two Ethiopian Israeli law students were in Vancouver this past month gaining experience at law firms in the city and telling their stories to Jewish schools, synagogues and groups.

Jerus Truneh, 26, and Erez Naga, 29, are entering their second year at Ono Academic College near Tel Aviv. She is interning at the law firm Blake, Cassels and Graydon LLP, while Naga is at Lawson, Lundell, Lawon and McIntosh.

The two students are enrolled in law school courtesy of funds raised by the Canadian Ben-Gurion Society (BGS), a young leadership program launched by Jewish federations across Canada.

Goldstone denies bias in report critical of Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper

JERUSALEM — The head of a United Nations commission that charged Israel with committing war crimes in the Gaza Strip during its offensive last winter wrote last week that soldiers and commanders must be held accountable for serious violations of international law during the fighting.

In a New York Times opinion piece, South African Judge Richard Goldstone wrote that "Israel must investigate, and Hamas is obliged to do the same. They must examine what happened and appropriately punish any soldier or commander found to have violated the law."

Goldstone accused both Israel and Hamas of conducting biased and ineffectual investigations, if at all, saying that "unfortunately, both Israel and Hamas have dismal records of investigating their own forces."

Goldstone also rejected allegations that his investigative team had set out on a biased mission.

"I deny that completely," Goldstone said in remarks broadcast following Israeli accusations. "I was completely independent, nobody dictated any outcome, and the outcome was a result of the independent inquiries that our mission made."

Goldstone, a respected war crimes judge from South Africa who is Jewish and has ties to Israel, told interviewers he stood behind his commission's findings and regretted only Israel's refusal to co-operate with the investigation.

"If there is any difference that I would have preferred, [it] would have been that we could have got co-operation from Israel, and in particular, I would have liked the Israeli government to assist us and decide what we should investigate, because that's what I asked them to

New Fellowship

TORONTO — Ashley Ansel of Thornhill, Ont., is one of 10 women to receive a new undergraduate scholarship for women in science from Yeshiva University's Stern College. The 10 recipients of the Jewish Foundation for Education of Women Science Fellowship will get $10,000 a year for three years, as well as summer research internships worth $2,500. They'll also receive mentoring and the chance to present their research at conferences. Ansel graduated from Ulpanat Orot in Toronto in 2008.

Mentors Sought

TORONTO — The Jewish-Somali Mentorship Project is seeking Jewish professionals to mentor Canadian Somali university students. The initiative, a program of the Canadian International Peace Project, is backed by Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC), UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Canadian Somali Congress. The mentorships are one year and require a commitment of four hours a month. Contact Rahma Hussein at 416-384-0123 or rahma.h@canadianipp.org for details.

Liberals Win Vote

TORONTO — The provincial Liberals held the midtown Toronto riding of St. Paul's in a byelection last week. Eric Hoskins, 48, will head to Queen's Park, replacing former cabinet minister Michael Bryant, who had held the riding since 1999 and left politics last April. St. Paul's has a significant number of Jewish residents, and three of the four major party candidates were Jewish.

WORLD

Columnist Dies

LOS ANGELES — Armand "Army" Archerd, the veteran show business columnist often called "the most trusted voice of Hollywood," died Sept. 8 in Los Angeles at age 87 of a rare form of lung cancer. For more than 53 years, he wrote a daily column for Daily Variety, the entertainment industry's trade paper. His more than 10,000 columns were read religiously by show business luminaries from Los Angeles to New York and around the world.

Las Vegas Paper Folds

LAS VEGAS — The Rosh Hashanah edition will be the last for the Las Vegas Jewish Reporter. Apparently a casualty of the recession, the 33-year-old, federation-owned paper is shuttering in the wake of low donations, the Las Vegas Sun reported.

Pope to Visit Shul

ROME — Pope Benedict XVI said he'll visit Rome's main synagogue after the High Holidays. In Rosh Hashanah greetings to Rome's Jews released Sept. 17 by the office of Rome's chief rabbi, the Pope said he looked forward "with joy" to the visit. Benedict has visited shuls in Germany and the United States as pope, but his Rome shul visit would be the first papal visit there since the historic one by Pope John Paul II in 1986, the first time a reigning pontiff had entered a synagogue.

Unions OK Boycott

LONDON— British trade unions approved a boycott against importing goods produced in some Israeli settlements. The boycott was approved Sept. 17 by the Trade Union Congress at its annual conference. It also called for an end to arms trading with Israel and for disinvestment from some Israeli companies. The unions had considered a comprehensive boycott of consumer goods produced in Israel but reconsidered following "frantic behind-the-scenes negotiations," the London Times reported. The boycott reportedly was in response to Israel's military offensive in Gaza last winter.

Chant Ruling Upheld

AMSTERDAM — The Dutch Supreme Court upheld a ruling that a soccer chant is offensive to Jews. A fan of The Hague soccer team ADO appealed a lower court verdict that the chant "Hamas, Hamas, gas all the Jews," for which he was charged in 2006 with using language offensive to a particular group, wasn't intended to offend Jews. Last week, the high court upheld the ruling because it insults Jews. The fan had received 800 hours of community service and two years probation. The opposing team, Ajax of Amsterdam, and their fans are often referred to as Jews because prior to World War II, the city had a large Jewish population and the team had many Jewish fans.

Prayer Trip Allowed

DES MOINES — A former Agriprocessors official awaiting trial was allowed pray at the grave of the Lubavitcher rebbe before Rosh Hashanah. A judge ruled last week that Sholom Rubashkin could be be driven from Postville, Iowa, to New York City to pray at the grave of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, even though he's been on supervised release from jail since February. Agriprocessors, once the largest kosher slaughterhouse in the United States, closed following a major immigration raid by federal officials in May 2008. Rubashkin is scheduled to go on trial in October. He was held in jail for three months after prosecutors argued he was a flight risk to Israel.

Official Suspended For Nazi Memorabilia

NEW YORK — Human Rights Watch suspended a senior official over his collection of Nazi memorabilia.

A pro-Israel blog had revealed that the human rights group's senior military analyst, Marc Garlasco, is a major collector of Nazi memorabilia. While the group gave Garlasco its full support when the news broke earlier this month, last week its associate director announced it was suspending him with full pay "pending an investigation."

The revelation comes as pro-Israel groups have worked to discredit the organization, which released several reports critical of Israel after its January offensive in Gaza.

Garlasco has said his hobby is a result of his family history – his grandfather was conscripted by the Nazis.

He posted an essay Sept. 11 on the Huffington Post website that said, in part, "I've never hidden my hobby… Precisely because it's so obvious that the Nazis were evil, I never realized that other people, including friends and colleagues, might wonder why I care about these things."

UJA Federation unveils new Gales Pavilion

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

As the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre closes its doors for the last time Sept. 27 before it is torn down and replaced, a new, adjacent building is filling many of the roles the 48-year-old BJCC has played in recent years, along with a couple of new ones

The Donald Gales Family Pavilion, a four-floor, approximately 40,000-square-foot, $10-million building, hosted an opening celebration last week, with formalities that included speeches by Toronto mayor David Miller and Vaughan MPP Greg Sorbara.

The completion of the pavilion, which has been in partial use since June, marks the end of the first phase of redevelopment of what's now known as the Sherman Campus. The 27.5-acre spread on Bathurst Street, north of Sheppard Avenue, houses the Lipa Green Building and the Leah Posluns Theatre, which will also be rebuilt.

Phase 1 also included renovation of the Lipa Green Building, which houses community offices, the Ontario Jewish Archives and the Holocaust Centre of Toronto. The building is connected to the new pavilion by an elevated, glassed-in bridge.

The Gales Pavilion houses administrative offices and programs of the Prosserman JCC (the entity that includes the building replacing the BJCC), as well as the Koffler Centre of the Arts and the David & Esther Freiman Early Childhood Education Centre, a nine-classroom facility that has been in use since Sept. 1.

As well, an 8,000-square-foot aerobics studio, with aerobic and weight machines, can accommodate about 45 people at a time, plus an additional 20 in its spinning classes. It will open Oct. 5. Also, fitness classes will be held in multi-purpose rooms in the building.

Of the BJCC's 1,200-plus fitness members, more than 700 had signed up for the Prosserman JCC as of last week, according to Bryan Keshen, its executive director. The Gales Pavilion can handle between 800 and 1,000 fitness members a day, he said.

The proposed culinary arts studio in the Gales Pavilion.

However, members who are regular swimmers and want to continue swimming will have to go elsewhere until the new facility is built. Also, the Gales Pavilion does not include a gymnasium for basketball players, and members who play racquet sports such as handball or squash will not have those options at all on the Sherman campus.

"In terms of what we think will serve the community best, we're not able to provide enough support or space for a proper racquet club experience," Keshen told The CJN. "You have to build it for success, and not just put in a couple of courts. We're going to focus on what we're great at – things that support social networking and large group activities. We just don't have the space or the skills to build a centre of excellence for racquet sports."

Things to know about the 'report'

The UN Human Rights Council's (UNHRC) report on the conduct of Israel's war in Gaza last December-January (see page 1) has far-reaching potential to harm the Jewish state in a number of ways

• Israel has been accused of having committed war crimes. It will soon likely also be accused of having committed crimes against humanity.

• There is now a heightened possibility that Israeli leaders will be charged with such crimes in the International Court of Justice in The Hague.

• The seamy iteration of polemics that the commission has passed off as fact-finding will now be adopted around the world by anti-Israel advocates as further "evidence" of the Jewish state's diabolical ways.

• This opens a new, legal front by anti-Israel advocates in their campaign to bring about the dismantling of the Jewish state.

• The non-uniformed soldiers of the terrorist armies of Hamas, Hezbollah, their like-minded companions and their accomplices have been given new weapons in their "holy" cause against Israel.

• The non-uniformed soldiers of all terrorist armies, their like-minded companions and their accomplices have been given new weapons in their "holy" causes against all democracies.

• Conversely, Israel and those democracies still determined to fight the terrorist organizations of the world may find their ability to do so diminished.

• In the name of upholding and advancing the struggle for human rights, the report actually does irreparable harm to the cause.

Indeed the report by Judge Richard Goldstone oozes harm and the potential for greater harm.

Writing in the Jerusalem Post, columnist Michael Freund said: "The Goldstone report is nothing less than a political pogrom... It has nothing to do with justice and everything to do with a political agenda which seeks to isolate the Jewish state, besmirch its good name and pressure it into making concessions to its enemies.

From the editor's desk...

"More than 60 years may have passed since the State of Israel was founded, but clearly much of the world still seems incapable of forgiving us for having the gall to defend ourselves."

The report is a radically abusive anti-Israel document. We should therefore become familiar with its content and especially with the facts and arguments must be marshalled against it.

The following is a small recommended reading list.

• Even before the report was released Irwin Cotler, the international human rights scholar and activist and MP wrote extensively in the Jerusalem Post about the commission's tainted mandate. "This flawed mission is not only established under the authority of the obsessively discriminatory UN Human Rights council, it is irredeemably tainted by the prejudicial resolution establishing the mission itself," Cotler wrote on Sept. 16.

• After seeing the initially released summary of the report, American legal scholar Alan Dershowitz wrote on his blog: "The so-called report commissioned by the notorious United Nations Human Rights Council issued under [Goldstone's] name is so filled with lies, distortions and blood libels that it could have been drafted by Hamas extremists."

• The Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs makes available a number of position papers that analyze the implications of the UNHRC report and provide information in answer to the report's statements of findings. The ministry's website contains a number of links to other Israeli government and army sources. These links provide additional factual and legal responses to the report's allegations

• Honest Reporting has published a background summary of the report and an overview regarding a selection of the report's failings. It, too, contains a reference guide to further informational resources.

• Israeli President Shimon Peres responded to the publication of Goldstone's report with fiery indignation and wrote very harsh and unequivocal words of condemnation and rejection of the report.

"The Goldstone report is a mockery of history," Peres began in his remarks.

"The report legitimizes terrorist activity, the pursuit of murder and death. The report disregards the duty and right of self-defence held by every sovereign state as enshrined in the UN Charter.

"The State of Israel was forced to defend itself. It acted out of obligation to its citizens like any sister state in the family of nations would.

"Israel has been criticized for its actions against Hezbollah attacks from Lebanon and Hamas attacks from the Gaza Strip as well as for building the security barrier in the West Bank to prevent suicide bombers from entering the country.

"Those in pursuit of peace have justice on their side. Those who monger war will forever be criminals."

The report effectively curtails Israel's right of self-defence. But, like all countries, peoples and societies, Israel wishes to live and will not allow anyone to impinge on its right to do so. –MBD

CIC uses 'buycott' to fight boycott

Will take direct action against those that 'demonize' Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The pro-Israel community in Canada is fed up with the seemingly endless boycott and divestment threats against the Jewish state, and its members aren't going to take it anymore.

That's essentially the message of the Canada-Israel Committee's (CIC) new Buycott Israel initiative, an online tool the CIC has constructed to alert members on its e-mail registry about boycott attempts on Israeli products in Canada, and in response urge mass purchasing in support of the products.

The project has been launched in partnership with the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and UJA Federation of Toronto.

In an interview from her Montreal office last week, CIC executive vice-president Sara Saber-Freedman said her organization noted the success of prior community responses to boycott attempts and decided this was the best way to mount grassroots countermeasures to anti-Zionist initiatives.

She referred specifically to two successful efforts to defeat boycotts over the past year, one by members of Mountain Equipment Co-op in Vancouver who tried to have the company adopt a resolution to drop all products it sourced from Israel, and the other in Toronto at a local LCBO store, where supporters of Israel bought up Israeli wines in solidarity with the Jewish state when anti-Zionists tried to boycott the products.

"There are far more people who support Israel than those against it," Saber-Freedman said.

"And we wanted to launch the campaign now... because it's a timely moment with everything going on at the [Toronto International Film Festival]," she added, referring to protests against the film fest's decision to showcase Tel Aviv films.

The CIC is keeping a close watch on the Vancouver community, she said, because it's believed the same people who put forward the Mountain Equipment Co-op boycott motion against Israeli-made products will try again at next year's annual meeting.

But Saber-Freedman was careful to note that the Buycott Israel project is "not a commercial undertaking" and won't promote individual products unless they're targeted.

Buycott Israel is "a tool for specific action... for when an Israeli product or event is under assault by people who want to delegitimize Israel," she said.

Sara Saber-Freedman

She added: "This is the most direct way we can say to anti-Israel activists... that not only will they not succeed in boycotting Israeli products, in fact, the [effect] will be just the opposite and will result in more sales of a particular product."

The Buycott Israel website went online on Sept. 11, and the committee is promoting it via its internal distribution lists and through its "network of friends" in synagogues and the Christian community, she said, noting that the CIC's board of directors includes a number of non-Jews who "are very well connected" in their own communities.

"People in the pro-Israel community – not just the Jewish community, but Israel's many friends in Canada – have asked for ways to take direct action against this nonsense, the dishonest attempts to demonize Israel... This is an opportunity for them to do that in a very simple, direct way."

Justice perverted, justice despised

"Israel, while required like any other state to accept international scrutiny of its conduct with regard to compliance with international law, is entitled to insist that such conduct be judged fairly and without bias" [our emphasis]

Those were the words of Judge Richard Goldstone, who led the UN Human Rights Council Mission that investigated the conduct of Israel's war against Hamas last January. He spoke them to the Jerusalem Post in July. His four-person commission delivered its report last week. To describe the document in mild terms: it is nasty. Its form may be legalistic, but its substance is sheer polemics.

The fairness and freedom from bias that Goldstone promised is Israel's right to expect was – as is almost always the case in matters of international due process regarding the Jewish state – a chimera.

The report is a full-length mirror reflection of the sordid, malevolent body, the United Nations Human Rights Council, that commissioned it. The report accuses Israel of having committed war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity in the Gaza war. It also accuses Hamas of having committed war crimes. But the overwhelming thrust and obsessive focus of the report – consistent with the single-minded, obsessive focus of the commission's mandate – was Israel. Indeed, it was because of that mandate that Canada and other countries, from the very outset, refused to support the work of the commission.

Among the outrageous findings of the commission was the statement that the Israel Defence Forces' military operations "were carefully planned in all their phases as a deliberately disproportionate attack designed to punish, humiliate and terrorize a civilian population." Israel's assault, the report concludes, "was directed at the people of Gaza as a whole."

The commissioners directed Israel to investigate the report's findings. But in a grotesque, underhanded, kick to the groin, the commission gratuitously derided the ability of Israel's judicial system to do so. Failure to adequately investigate the findings "in conformity with international standards," the commissioners warned, could lead to prosecution of Israeli leaders and soldiers by the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

And so on. The report is a wicked weave of anti-Israel rebuke.

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu correctly referred to the investigation as a " a kangaroo court" and the report as "a prize for terrorism that would damage a democratic state's ability to fight terror."

President Shimon Peres called the report "a mockery of history that fails to distinguish between the aggressor and a state that exercises its right for self defence."

It is difficult to understand Goldstone's participation in this travesty. The cause of justice has been set back. The report perverts justice, as if the very notion of it regarding the right of the Jewish state to live sovereign and free in the Middle East is itself a despised idea.

Shame.

Rabbinical 'brain drain'

As an American-trained Canadian rabbi who chose to return to Toronto upon ordination, I was struck by Daniel Held's column "Where have the Canadians gone?" (Sept. 10). Held correctly notes the disproportionately high number of Canadians, himself included ("Cdn. fellows named," Aug. 13), in American-based Jewish professional training programs, and especially in the prestigious Wexner Graduate Fellowship. Our community should be proud.

Of Canadians who go to the United States for Jewish training, he writes: "These young leaders don't come back." Unfortunately, he overstates the point. It is wonderful, and Held would argue remarkable, that both Canadians in my graduating class from the Rabbinical School of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America – Rabbi Jarrod Grover of Beth Tikvah Synagogue being the other – took jobs in Toronto upon ordination this past May. I like to think here that Canada has not lost, but has rather regained the "best and brightest of our professional Jewish minds."

Notwithstanding our experience, beyond familial attachments and the usual "Canada is better than America" shpeel, there is little incentive for Canadians to return. Held's proposed solution to the declared "brain drain," more scholarships with return-to-Canada-upon-graduation stipulations, while commendable, is only partial and not appropriate for more specialized fields such as the pulpit rabbinate, where each denomination has few and oftentimes no openings for newly minted rabbis.

I challenge our community organizations to develop more summer and year-long internships, much as law firms do, aimed at Canadians, where, if everyone is happy, upon graduation, the internship develops into a full-time job. Ultimately, however, I am less concerned about Canadians returning than about how we promote ourselves to all Jewish professionals. While a Canadian comes with insider knowledge, she is not always the best person for the job. The number of non-Canadians in my class even considering coming to Canada was decidedly small.

Cotler vs. Kenney

Why does The CJN give member of Parliament Irwin Cotler better coverage by placing him on page 1 than it gives cabinet minister Jason Kenney, placed on page 56, denouncing Hamas and Hezbollah as anti-Semitic? ("Cotler briefs South African leaders on Iran" and "Kenney denounces Hamas, Hezbollah as 'anti-Semitic,'" Sept. 10)

Cotler is nothing but a backbench MP of a party that when in power, never placed either of those groups on the government's terrorist list and who consistently voted against Israel at the United Nations.

Meanwhile the Conservative party is the strongest supporter of Israel since former prime minister Brian Mulroney, yet your paper continues to favour the Liberals. Get with it.

UJA financial information

I have recently received a richly illustrated brochure of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's many activities, together with a solicitation to contribute to this year's campaign. I do not doubt UJA's important role in the life of the Jewish community, here and overseas, nor of the many institutions and programs that rely heavily on its support for their activities.

I am, however, troubled by a critical omission in the UJA brochure or other literature that I have received. There is no accounting worthy of the name of how the funds collected by the UJA in the past year have been disbursed among the various beneficiaries, how much has been retained as a reserve fund, or the size of administrative expenses incurred by the organization in absolute terms and as a ratio of the collected funds.

I recently received the annual report of the president of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem. It contains a separate section providing a considerable amount of detail about the university's income and expenditures, as is to be expected from an institution of this importance. We know, too, of course, that securities regulations in Canada and the United States require the issuers of publicly traded securities to provide their shareholders with regular financial reports.

Those who support the UJA are also "investors" in an enormously important enterprise and deserve to be treated no less seriously. By providing the missing financial information, the UJA could also serve as an important role model for other fundraising institutions in the Jewish community that have been similarly deficient in reporting on the financial aspects of their operations.

Rosh Hashanah Greetings

'The spirit of partnership must be enhanced'

Hopefully, the coming new year will be marked by the realization of our aspirations: attaining peace, increasing security, promoting economic growth, safeguarding the future of the Jewish people and strengthening the ties between Israel and our Jewish brothers in the Diaspora.

The opportunity to attain peace is beckoning and must be seized, even at the cost of painful concessions. The Arab world's intractable position to say "no" to negotiations, "no" to recognition of Israel and "no" to peace has today been replaced by the three-fold "yes" to the Saudi [peace] initiative [the plan offers Israel recognition and permanent peace with all Arab countries in return for an Israeli withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Six Day War]. The international community is keen to support endeavours to move the peace process forward, and I am confident that, with concerted efforts, the vision of a comprehensive peace can be realized. This will create stability, tranquility, security and prosperity for our children and their children after them.

Shimon Peres

Nuclear arms in the possession of extremist fundamentalist hands pose a danger to the whole of humanity and not only to Israel. A broad and consolidated stand by the international community against Iran is called for. I pray that this terrible threat be removed from all of humanity and that the world may enjoy a new era of peace and security.

Israel's economy is showing the first sparks of recovery from the global economic crisis. The macro-economic signs are promising, and these indications are reflected in a growing scope of investments, the high-tech industry is reviving and startup companies are again sprouting. This is the time to seize the opportunity. This is the time to invest in Israel in fields such as alternative energy, water production, homeland security infrastructures, educational and learning-related tools, and in the stem-cell industry. This constitutes the future and it is in our hands.

It is vital to build with our brethren in the Diaspora ties based on solid foundations of partnership and education. Indeed, the role of Jewish education in the Diaspora cannot be overestimated. It serves as the very building blocks of the bridges that connect the Jewish communities abroad and Israel. It serves as the terms of engagement between the young generation of Jewish youth and our nation, and as the stepping-stones to a greater awareness of the significance of Israel-Diaspora relations. It will serve to preserve our rich heritage and traditions.

The spirit of partnership must be enhanced in every area of Israel-Diaspora relations. We face dramatic challenges, which again underscore the necessity to stand united in moments of trial, responsible one for the other, as dictated by our prophets. Indeed, a threat to the well-being of Jewish communities in the world equates a threat to Israel itself, and the fate of Diaspora Jewry is at the very core of Israel's heart.

Dear friends, as we embark on this new year, I want to convey my heartfelt good wishes to all of the Jewish people in the Diaspora, in the hope that it will be a year of joy and good tidings to all.

And let us pray for the safe return home of the hostages and missing soldiers.

Shanah Tovah U'Metukah.

Shimon Peres

'Above all, we must remain united'

As Jewish communities around the world celebrate Rosh Hashanah 5770, I want to wish you all a Shanah Tovah from Jerusalem, the eternal undivided capital of the State of Israel and the Jewish people.

Rosh Hashanah offers all of us an opportunity not only to take stock of the past year but also to focus our hopes and prayers on the year ahead.

Benjamin Netanyahu

Much has changed in the past year. Last year, Israeli cities were relentlessly rocketed by Iranian-backed Hamas terrorists, and our economy, like many of those around the world, was heading into a severe recession. Today, the residents of the south are enjoying a period of calm they have not experienced for many years, and the economy has begun to show signs of a recovery.

While only five months in office, our national unity government has already forged a broad economic coalition of government, business and labour to pass an unprecedented two-year budget and a historic land reform that will significantly boost economic growth for years to come.

But there is much work to be done. We must continue to safeguard our national security against the considerable threats still facing us. We must restore robust economic growth, improve education in our schools and clamp down on crime in our streets. And we must advance a responsible peace process with the goal of forging an historic peace with our neighbours.

Above all, we must remain united. Our national unity government has given expression to the broad consensus that exists in this country. While national unity is always an important asset, in challenging times it is indispensable. That is why in the years ahead, while we work to achieve our ambitious goals, I will do everything in my power to unite our people.

This unity is necessary both inside and outside of Israel. The bonds between Israel and Diaspora Jewish communities throughout the world are a tremendous source of strength, and I will work to strengthen those bonds in the years ahead.

May you all be inscribed in the Book of Life, and may our people enjoy a year of security, prosperity and peace.

Sincerely,

Benjamin Netanyahu

The catastrophe of Palestinian self-exile

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

Arab demands for their "right of return" (to Israel) have been a major stumbling block in all attempts to bring an end to the Palestinian-Israeli conflict. And amid the propaganda frenzy that seems always to call attention to the plight of Palestinian refugees, the full context, and historic record, of what really happened when the State of Israel was restored in 1948 are either denied or conveniently ignored.

The central premise, according to the so-called "Arab narrative," is that more than 750,000 Palestinians were displaced from their homes and sent into exile by Israeli forces before and during Israel's War of Independence. The term "ethnic cleansing" has been the calumny of choice when Israel's accusers describe what was purported to have occurred. That the numbers are substantially inflated (according to Israeli and even United Nations sources) and that the "ethnic cleansing" descriptor only entered the lexicon in the 1990s, and was specific to events in Bosnia and Herzegovina, seem not to be at all pertinent to a discourse that is so plainly designed to be misleading.

Notably, none other than Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas himself recently forgot his party line when reminiscing over his personal experiences in Safed in 1948. Interviewed on Al-Palestina Television, on July 6, he commented "people were motivated to run away… they feared retribution from Zionist terrorist organizations, particularly from the Safed ones. Those of us from Safed especially feared that the Jews harboured old desires to avenge what happened during the 1929 uprising."

Columnist Sarah Honig (Jerusalem Post, July 17) explains that what Abbas was of course admitting was that the exile of the Arabs of Safed was voluntary, "propelled by their extreme consciousness of guilt and expectation that Jews would be ruled by the same blood-feud conventions that prevail in Arab culture."

The notion of forcible removals of Arab communities by Israeli forces is bogus. Aside from Abbas' more recent admissions, there are many accounts, both scholarly and anecdotal, that speak to a vastly different reality than that expressed in the "Arab narrative." Particularly in Haifa, but in most other centres as well, Arab inhabitants were persuaded, or ordered, to leave by their own Arab Higher Committee, on the pretext that they would be welcomed back once Israel was defeated.

Until the Palestinians are able to accept the reality of how they were deceived by their own leadership in 1948, and unless they are able to remove the finger of blame from Israel for the catastrophe of their self-exile and shift towards renouncing their "right of return," progress toward a durable peace will remain elusive.

Israel's water problem more pressing than ever

Yair Lootsteen in Jerusalem

Approaching Ben-Gurion Airport late last month, I overheard a couple of first-time tourists in the row behind me as they peered down at the countryside. They noted how brown everything looked. It's a feeling I also have when returning to Israel at this time of year, but during this descent, the landscape seemed drearier than usual, due to four years of below-average rainfall.

It's no secret that Israel has a water problem. That's to be expected in a country with virtually no rain from early May to early October. But the situation has deteriorated considerably in the last decade.

In these days of reflection before Yom Kippur, Israelis should add personal and collective stock-taking of our aqua vita to the list of concerns we're pondering.

Let's start with some facts and figures. Israel has three main natural sources of fresh water – Lake Kinneret, the Coastal Aquifer along the Mediterranean and the Mountain Aquifer, shared with the Palestinians.

According to the Israel Water Authority, in 2006, per capita water consumption was 170 cubic metres, compared with 508 cubic metres in 1967, a dramatic decrease attributed to population growth and the decline of both fresh water availability and agriculture. By comparison, in 2000 Canada's per capita water consumption was roughly 1,500 cubic metres, second only to the United States.

The Kinneret, which provides 38 per cent of Israel's freshwater needs, is nearly at its lowest level ever, some 5.5 metres below its maximum. It's a sight for sore eyes, with swimmers and boats dwarfed by the quays and lifeguard stations storeys above them.

In the Middle East, water is not only scarce, it's also volatile. In 1964, Israel attacked Syria when it began diverting waters reaching the Jordan River. Since 2002, Lebanon has been redirecting waters from the Wazzani River to villages in its south. The Wazzani runs into the Hatsbani, which in turn feeds the Jordan River, the Kinneret's largest single source. The Hatsbani provides the Jordan with 25 per cent of its water, and Israel has threatened to take military action, but has yet to do so, letting lawyers and diplomats fight it out for now.

Israel also provides Jordan and the Palestinian Authority with water. According to the 1994 peace accord with Jordan, Israel supplies the Hashemite Kingdom with 50 million cubic metres of water from the Kinneret yearly. Similarly, it's been supplementing the Palestinian Authority beyond its initial undertakings and is presently supplying the Palestinians with some 50 million cubic metres annually, despite Palestinian violations of their water-related obligations, particularly in allowing drilling of unapproved wells in the West Bank.

With these and other serious supply issues, Israel needs firm action to avert severe shortages. Over the years, importing water from Turkey has been a supposed elixir that has never materialized, because its cost is prohibitive and because it could create geopolitical pressures for this important Muslim ally.

With a seemingly endless supply of water in the Mediterranean, desalination could well be an efficient solution. However, our politicians and bureaucrats have been late at the gate, and environmentalists complain that desalinating harms both air and sea. Despite these objections, 140 million cubic metres are being provided yearly using desalination and there are concrete plans to expand to 550 million cubic metres by 2013.

Continual water conservation is another goal, supported by aggressive educational and advertising campaigns. From an early age, Israeli kids learn how to brush their teeth, shower and flush using less water. And we're all barraged with aggressive campaigns urging us to use less water for just about everything.

Finally, like many other things, consumers have been hit in their pocketbooks. Starting this summer, families of four using more than 15 cubic metres a month pay a 20-shekel surcharge for every further cubic metre they use. Despite criticizing their non-progressive nature, Israelis have already internalized the new regulations. In August, domestic water consumption dropped 17.5 per cent compared to August 2008, saving a whopping 13 million cubic metres.

We can blame Mother Nature, global warming or just plain lack of effective crisis management for our predicament. But whether you're religious or not, I propose that starting after Sukkot, we should all recite a daily prayer for rain in Israel: meteorologists are once again predicting a no-more-than-average rainy season this winter.

The state of the Jewish nation – 5770

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

We made it through another year, another nasty war (Gaza, for those who might have forgotten), another election, six months of another Netanyahu premiership, and our share of the global economic meltdown. And we're still here, more or less intact.

This in itself is a cause for some celebration, tempered by the requisite introspection of the High Holidays and period of repentance for our sins.

In truth, none of our basic problems – Israel's and the Jewish nation's – have been solved, and progress, if any, is slow. We keep buying time, and, like the wise men and women of Chelm, spend most of our time in profound debate with each other. The essential Jewish question– "Nu?" – remains, as does the standard answer – "nu, nu."

Maybe this is the best we can realistically hope for under the difficult circumstances. Iran looms very large as we enter the New Year – another "year of decision," likely to see either a military strike and the uncertain consequences that result, or accommodation with Iran's fanatical leaders, armed with nuclear weapons. Hope comes from the unhappiness of many young Iranians who have had enough of the Islamic dictatorship, but this may not be enough to prevent a blow-up.

On the issue of war and peace, polls show that most Israelis are wary of messianic "solutions" and resigned to small steps that may result in less violence, or the reverse. In contrast, Diaspora Jewry on both the left and right appear to be stuck in the 1990s, (some are still in the '60s), fighting the Oslo wars long after that experiment failed, and the reality of Arab rejectionism and violence returned. Unlike the J Street crowd, Israelis are not impressed by U.S. President Barack Obama's smooth rhetoric or frightened into submission by unsubtle pressure.

But this doesn't mean there's much support for settlement expansion – this is also a relic of earlier decades, and is confined to a small but very vocal minority. If there's a realistic alternative to the status quo, most Israelis would grab it, in order to end the damage resulting from the daily friction with the Palestinians, and the threat to the Jewish and democratic framework. So Netanyahu knows that he needs to tread close to the centre of the political map.

Similarly, this pragmatic Zionism and the ongoing challenges of building a functioning Jewish society dominate the domestic arena. Few Israelis stop to consider the amazing accomplishment of successfully absorbing more than one million refugees from the former Soviet Union – one fifth of the population – in less than 20 years. This is not to deny the ongoing challenges, as well as the additional ones posed by the much smaller aliyah of Ethiopian Jews, but when placed in perspective, Israel has done well in this and other areas.

At the same time, there's still a long way to go in rebuilding a thriving Jewish society in Israel. Sixty-one years is a very short time in the history of the Jewish people, and there's a long way to go. We're still grappling with the issues of religion and state, and have not yet figured out the best role for rabbis, particularly those demanding the unlimited authority that rabbinical leaders often enjoyed in the Diaspora.

Other social issues will continue to provide challenges for Israelis and Jews from abroad who decide to play a role in this historic process. Environmental consciousness in Israel is still far from the levels of North America and Europe, and the damage in our small country is much greater. (One of the greatest failures of groups such as the New Israel Fund is the diversion of money into fringe politics instead of recycling and similar policies.) It's true that the security situation and the constant threat of war and terror tend to divert energies from other issues, but the damage grows as a result, and much of it is irreversible.

In summary, Israel has plenty to atone for, but it also has some serious achievements to celebrate. Perhaps it's not a country like every other country, as Herzl had envisioned for the Jewish State in "Old/New Land," but it's far less problematic than the chorus of critics claim. While we need to continue to respond to challenges, there are also important achievements to celebrate as we enter the Jewish year 5770.

The Kirshner File

Polish-Jewish relations have improved

Old fashioned, corrosive Polish stereotypes about Jews linger stubbornly in Kazimierz, of all places. Kazimierz, a pre-Holocaust centre of Jewish life in the southern city of Krakow, has materially capitalized on its historic association with Jews. Jewish-style restaurants and cafes, as well as vendors flogging Judaica and books with Jewish themes, cater to a booming tourist trade, while the Jewish Cultural Festival attracts hordes of visitors. You would think that Polish entrepreneurs and merchants who profit from this lucrative influx of travellers would be sensitive to anti-Semitism. Yet at shops and hotels in Kazimierz, repulsive wooden figurines of stereotypical chassidic Jews are for sale. Most of the figurines are charming, but one figurine, clasping a coin in one hand and clutching a bag of coins in another hand, panders to prejudices that can only reinforce existing notions of money-grubbing Jews. When I asked a hotel owner why he carried such figurines, his jaw dropped and his face went ashen before replying that they were simply good luck charms.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

"In Polish folklore, Jews and money go together," explained Anna Pawlikowska, a magazine editor and advocate of Christian-Jewish dialogue. "Some Poles don't yet understand that such figurines are offensive."

These ill-conceived figurines, however, are the least of the problem in the convoluted saga of Polish-Jewish relations, which the director of the Jewish Cultural Festival, Janusz Makuch, describes as "very complicated."

During the Middle Ages, Jews fleeing persecution in western Europe found a safe haven in Poland thanks to Polish kings. By the third decade of the 20th century, at least 3.3 million Jews lived in Polin, as it was called by Jews in Yiddish.

But after about 800 years of coexistence, Jews and Poles were not exactly the best of friends, their relationship tarnished by the spectre of anti-Semitism and mutually antagonistic stereotypes.

Surveying this spiteful landscape, scholar Joanna Rohozinska observes in the Central Europe Review, "Both sides tend to adopt inflexible, judgmental and defensive attitudes toward one another, practically forestalling any chances at reconciliation."

The period following Polish independence in 1918 was especially problematic. Pogroms erupted, and the primate of the Roman Catholic church, Cardinal August Hlond, issued a notorious pastoral letter in which he stated that "there will be a Jewish problem" as long as Jews remained in Poland and in which he supported a boycott of Jewish businesses.

Maciej Kozlowski, Poland's former ambassador to Israel, acknowledged that there was "vicious" anti-Semitism in Poland during the inter-war interregnum. Indeed, it was an era when Jewish university students were forced to sit on "ghetto benches" and when Poles and Jews were preoccupied with finding a solution to the "Jewish question."

To Poles who disliked Jews and considered them an alien component in Polish society, the only solution was emigration, an idea to which Zionists subscribed. One of them, Yitzhak Shamir, a future prime minister of Israel, would declare that anti-Semitism was deeply imbued in Polish tradition and mentality. Reflecting on these two solitudes, Polish academic Monika Adamczyk-Garbowska told me that Poles and Jews essentially lived separate lives and were "worlds apart" before World War II.

During Germany's occupation, the vast majority of Poles remained indifferent to the suffering and mass murder of Jews. The Catholic church concentrated on providing assistance to converted Jews, writes scholar Dariusz Libionka. Tellingly, not one of the three councils convened by Polish bishops during the Nazi occupation mentioned the Holocaust, he adds. In other cases, Poles informed on Jews. In extreme instances, such as in the town of Jedwabne, Poles, egged on by the Nazis, massacred their Jewish neighbours.

Yet Poles also exhibited courage and heroism. Zegota, a Polish Catholic organization, rescued several thousand Jewish children. In all, more than 6,000 Poles rescued Jews, risking their lives to do so.

Yad Vashem, the Holocaust memorial and museum in Jerusalem, has recognized them as Righteous Gentiles. Also worth mentioning is the fact that Poland, unlike France, did not have a collaborationist government in place doing the bidding of the Nazis.

Zbigniew Nosowski

After the war, a wave of pogroms swept across Poland, the worst one breaking out in Kielce in 1946. Cardinal Adam Sapieha is reported to have observed that Jews brought the violence upon themselves because Jewish bureaucrats served the Communist regime.

In a paper, Adamczyk-Garbowska says that the Kielce pogrom "created an atmosphere of panic" and drove thousands of (Holocaust) survivors out of Poland.

Jan Gross, a Polish-born scholar living in the United States, writes that survivors returning to Poland were often met by hostility from Poles who had taken their property.

The notion that Jews had an affinity for communism, and were thus disloyal to Poland, is contained in the phrase Zydo-Komuna, which still resonates in Polish right-wing nationalist circles.

It is true that Jews were disproportionately represented in Poland's pre-war and post-war Communist party, yet an overwhelming preponderance of Polish Jews were staunchly opposed to communism.

Zbigniew Nosowski, the editor of Wiez, a Catholic intellectual monthly, and a member of the Polish Council of Christians and Jews, addressed this sensitive issue. As he put it in an interview, "Jews were over-represented in the Communist party." But in a reference to the Solidarity trade union, he quickly added, "Jews were also over-represented in the anti-communist movement."

In retrospect, Polish Jews could hardy consider communism a blessing, even if some benefited from it. In 1968, less than a year after Poland severed diplomatic relations with Israel, the Polish government launched an anti-Semitic campaign under the guise of anti-Zionism, prompting upwards of 30,000 assimilated and Polonized Jews to emigrate.

"This campaign broke the back of the Jewish community," said Konstanty Gebert, a well-connected Jewish journalist based in Warsaw. "There was a climate of intimidation. Jews were forced into a social and psychological ghetto. These events enjoyed a certain amount of popular support. 'Jewish rule' in Poland had ended. The Catholic church never once spoke out against it."

The advent of democracy in Poland since the demise of communism in 1989 has had a salutary effect on Polish-Jewish relations.

The pro-Israel Polish government has encouraged the Jewish revival taking place in Poland today, and some important figures in the church, including the current archbishop of Lublin, Josef Zycinski, have displayed a refreshing openness to Jews and Judaism.

Certainly, the late Polish pope, John Paul II, contributed to this positive and important atmosphere. Gone are the days when controversy simmered over the placement of crosses at the Auschwitz-Birkenau concentration camp. "Polish-Jewish relations are definitely getting better," said Nosowski. "There is better mutual understanding."

Yet as Stanislaw Krajewski – a Jewish community activist – noted, anti-Semitism in Poland remains "pretty strong." Radio Maryja, which is run by Catholic priest Tadeusz Rydzyk, occasionally broadcasts anti-Semitic commentaries, while hooligans at football matches shout, 'Jews to the gas chambers.'

Nonetheless, as Poland's Chief Rabbi Michael Schudrich believes, anti-Semitism in Poland in 2009 is no more serious than it is in the rest of Europe.

Tel Aviv controversy dogs TIFF to last day

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Even as the Toronto International Film Festival was winding down last week, the controversy surrounding the City to City spotlight on Tel Aviv was still going strong.

On Sept. 17, the eighth day of the 10-day event, Egyptian producer Sherif Mandour withdrew his film to protest the festival's spotlight on 10 Israeli films.

"My point of view is not to participate in anything celebrating Israel, especially Tel Aviv… The Gaza war was not too far off, and people are still suffering. It's not the time to celebrate or participate in any culture with Israel," he told the Toronto Star.

The controversy began in the days leading up to the festival, which ran from Sept. 10 to 19, when filmmaker and York University professor John Greyson announced he had pulled his film to protest the spotlight on Tel Aviv.

Soon after, more than 50 actors, directors, and authors – including author Naomi Klein and actors Jane Fonda and Danny Glover – endorsed an online letter titled "The Toronto Declaration: No Celebration of Occupation," to protest the decision to celebrate Israeli culture.

> 'We welcome the discussion that is being prompted by our series'

The organizers of the declaration held a press conference Sept. 14 at Ryerson University to clarify that while it did not call for a boycott of films or filmmakers, it criticized the choice to spotlight Tel Aviv just months after the Gaza war, and it accused TIFF organizers of being part of an attempt by Israel to divert attention from the conflict.

The protesters accused festival organizers of being pawns in a year-long "Brand Israel" marketing campaign, a pilot project co-ordinated by the Israeli Consulate in Toronto that aimed to focus public attention on aspects of Israel unrelated to the Palestinian conflict. Both the consulate and the festival denied the City to City program was part of the campaign, or that Israel exerted pressure on organizers to screen particular films.

"It is always uncomfortable when culture is drawn into politics. But let us recall that it was TIFF that injected politics into the festival by choosing to honour the State of Israel with a celebratory spotlight, a decision seen by many Palestinians as taking Israel's side in the conflict," the declaration organizers said in a press release.

During the press conference, they announced that more than 1,500 people had endorsed the letter, which sparked a response from other filmmakers and celebrities to support TIFF's decision to highlight Israeli films.

That day, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles released a list of celebrities – including Natalie Portman, Sacha Baron Cohen, Jerry Seinfeld, Darren Starr, Jason Alexander, Lenny Kravitz and Lisa Kudrow – who had endorsed a statement titled "We don't need another blacklist."

"Anyone who has actually seen recent Israeli cinema, movies that are political and personal, comic and tragic, often critical, knows they are in no way a propaganda arm for any government policy. Blacklisting them only stifles the exchange of cultural knowledge that artists should be the first to defend and protect," the statement said.

Actor Viggo Mortensen, who added his name to the list of protesters, said in a release that "those who have attacked the statement… are simply spreading misinformation and, unfortunately, continuing the ongoing successful distraction from the issue at hand: the Israeli government's whitewashing of their illegal and inhumane actions inside and outside their legal national borders."

Consul General Amir Gissin addressed the controversy in a Sept. 18 opinion piece in the National Post.

"I agree with the anti-Israeli activists about one thing: the real issue was not the boycott, nor the Israeli filmmakers. It was a struggle about Israel's right to be presented positively," Gissin said.

"Ms. Klein, Mr. Greyson and their followers have ineffectively tried to establish veto privileges over any attempt to relate to Israel other then through the prism of the conflict. They are promoting a narrative that presents Israel as the new South Africa. There is a name for this process: It is called 'branding.'"

He said more than 30 countries are involved in some kind of branding campaign, but "no other country was ever criticized for branding itself; but in Israel's case, branding is deemed a demonic exercise of the 'Israeli propaganda machine.'

"This even though the Israeli government sponsors award-winning films with self-critical view points that often deal with the conflict that the critics claims we are trying to hide. An odd machine."

In a new statement released last week, TIFF director and CEO Piers Handling and co-director Cameron Bailey reiterated that they stand behind their decision to highlight Tel Aviv films this year.

"We welcome the discussion that is being prompted by our series. We programmed City to City to give our audience a window into Tel Aviv from the perspective of filmmakers who live and work there – this includes filmmakers who cast a critical eye on the status quo."

After the release of the statement by celebrities who supported the program, Fonda, who was one of the first to sign the "Toronto Declaration," expressed regret over endorsing it.

In a Sept. 14 column on the Huffington Post website, she said that she "signed the letter without reading it carefully enough, without asking myself if some of the wording wouldn't exacerbate the situation rather than bring about constructive dialogue."

Space available for community, life-cycle events

The pavilion was designed so that as much of the space as possible would be multi-purpose, according to Gary Siepser, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's senior vice-president of strategic community planning, who led one of the post-launch facility tours. However, specialty spaces include a media studio equipped with 19 computers, a ceramics studio, and a culinary arts studio with a large demonstration island and overhead mirror for cooking classes and workshops.

Leslie Gales

There is also space available for community and life-cycle events such as weddings, federation president David Koschitzky noted at the launch.

Phase 2 will include a 70,000-square-foot athletic facility, the National Centre for Jewish Heritage (which will include the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre, Committee for Yiddish offices, and the Ontario Jewish Archives, all of which are currently housed in the Lipa Green Building) and a new Leah Posluns Theatre.

Construction will begin in 2011 at the earliest, because "it takes about a year to decommission the [current] building," federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN.

Phase 2 is expected to take approximately three years to finish, he added.

Peter Cohen, chair of the Sherman Campus development committee, said in a speech that, "if we were going to do something to attract the young people, we had to do something excellent."

"We wanted a stronger and more vibrant Jewish community," said Leslie Gales, who served as the overall project's first campaign co-chair with Barry Sherman.

The renovations are part of the federation's $400-million "Tomorrow Campaign," a three-pronged effort that began about a decade ago. It includes the 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan, and the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life in downtown Toronto.

In a video taken a week before the opening when Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty visited the Sherman Campus, McGuinty praised the project, which received a $15-million grant from his government, for creating 200 jobs at a time when they were "most needed." As well, he said it fosters a better quality of life through its seniors' programs, as well as its daycare, early childhood education, and fitness facilities.

Miller called the BJCC "a remarkable place... not just on behalf of the Jewish community but for all Torontonians," and lauded the federation for raising money to help the less fortunate.

Shul's past presidents carry Torahs in the new sanctuary.

Beth Torah celebrates addition, renovation

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

It's been called "the little shul that could," but these days, Beth Torah Congregation's building is quite a bit larger than it used to be.

The unaffiliated conservative shul in the Dufferin Street and Lawrence Avenue area last week marked the culmination of its "Completing the Dream" campaign, which began in 2005. The major renovation includes a new sanctuary, as well as a revamped chapel and refurbished social hall.

Under the leadership of Rabbi Yossi Sapirman, the almost half-century old shul has more than doubled in size from 200 to 500 families in the past few years, and now it's no longer bursting at the seams.

The grand re-opening, held Sept. 13, allowed old and new members to pay tribute to donors who contributed $6 million to the campaign, including a $1.5 million contribution from Harry Turk.

"As we complete the dream of our founders and our congregation, we are all in awe of what our collective determination has accomplished," Rabbi Sapirman said.

"Our future and our past are contained in an exquisite place created by a beautiful community."

Harold Wolkin, campaign co-chair along with David Glick, said Beth Torah's new addition was built upon the shul's original foundation of values and traditions.

"We vividly remember the awe we felt when presented with the first concept drawing by our talented architectural team of Cindy Rendely and Jerome Markson. To be able to touch and feel their magic in transforming these drawings into the spiritual reality of today has been uplifting," Wolkin said.

The new sanctuary, reflecting a minimalist and environmental esthetic, is illuminated with natural light and constructed from wood, stone and metal. The ark is the focal point, and its copper mosaic, reminiscent of the Temple layout, is an abstract replica of a page from the Talmud, said Rabbi Sapirman.

The bimah, built for accessibility and participation, features three wide stairs and a ramp.

"As I stand on the bimah as your cantor and enjoy the beauty of our sanctuary, I will be reminded of the shul's beginnings and what it took to get here today," said David Young, Beth Torah's cantor since 1999.

"Joseph was a dreamer whose dreams came true. We, too, had a dream that has now been fulfilled."

Toronto Councillor Howard Moscoe, who has been a member of the synagogue with his wife for 30 years, said while many shuls are struggling to survive, Beth Torah is flourishing. He said what attracted him to the synagogue was its vibrant community spirit and friendly family atmosphere – an energy he said that will last for many more decades.

Also in attendance at the grand opening were Lieut.-Gov. David Onley, MP Joe Volpe, city Councillor Adam Giambrone and Amir Gissin, Israel's consul general in Toronto.

"As you celebrate this significant event, you can all take great pride in the knowledge that Beth Torah and its educational and community programs will be able to grow in the years ahead, while maintaining its role as an intimate family shul," Gissin said.

"Toronto is the closest place to Israel at heart. It is the battlefield for Israel's image, and it is people like you who ensure that."

Betel Centre cancels Ashkenazi holiday services

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a break with longstanding tradition, the Bernard Betel Centre has cancelled the Ashkenazi High Holiday services that are usually held in the facility's main auditorium.

Instead, worshippers have been advised that nearby synagogues will welcome them to Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur services, with no increase in the ticket price they had paid at centre.

The development has puzzled Lou Wasser, 87, who has been davening at Bernard Betel for at least eight years.

"I begged them, don't do this to old people," Wasser said. Most of the seniors who attend the centre's High Holiday services don't have driver's licenses and will find it difficult to attend services elsewhere, he said, adding that his suggestion to switch to the room that's used for regular Shabbat services for approximately 20 people was also turned down.

Esta Wall, executive director of the Bernard Betel Centre, said High Holiday services in the main auditorium have attracted approximately 200 worshippers in the past.

However, "over the past several years, we have become increasingly concerned over the quality of the services we've provided. We wanted seniors to have the most warm, meaningful and spiritual service," she said.

"It has been difficult for us to acquire a chazzan for the last two years. We brought in a chazzan from the United States, but he was horrible."

Participants in past High Holiday services were surveyed, "and based on the feedback we received" the change was implemented.

Arrangements were made with nearby shuls to accommodate Bernard Betel's worshippers, and many agreed to reduce their ticket prices to the same $75 paid by the seniors.

The auditorium that had been used by for Ashkenazi services has been turned over to one of the Sephardi congregations that worship there. Four different groups – two Sephardi, one Russian Orthodox and the Ashkenazim – hold regular services at the Bernard Betel Centre.

A letter sent to the Ashkenazi congregants provided a list of nearby shuls they could attend. Most are a short distance from the centre, although one, Beth David B'nai Israel Beth Am Synagogue, will hold services at the Richmond Hill Centre for the Performing Arts.

That's where Wasser will be davening, and he's not particularly happy about it. "This is the first time in my life I have to drive on Rosh Hashanah or Yom Kippur. To do a thing like this to an old man, I don't know."

He rejected other, closer shuls, because he didn't want to sit apart from his wife, divided by a mechitzah, or because he felt he'd feel uncomfortable following a different style of service.

Wall said this year's change may not necessarily be permanent. "We'd like to hear back from people about their experience. If they're not happy and grateful, we'll look at alternatives.

"We like to do the best for our seniors. They're the [uppermost] in our minds," she said.

York stays open on Yom Kippur

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

For the first time in 35 years, York University will keep its doors open on the Jewish High Holidays.

This year, Yom Kippur is the only High Holiday that falls on a weekday – Rosh Hashanah falls on a weekend – forcing observant Jewish students to miss just one day of classes, on Monday, Sept. 28.

Matan Hazanov, Hillel at York president, said that working with professors to make up for missed classes shouldn't be a problem.

"York has a very accommodating policy for students who miss class because of religious holidays," he said.

"This year we lucked out, because we only have one class that falls on a holiday, but students are making sure to talk to their professors before the holiday comes up to make arrangements with them."

Last September, York's senate passed a resolution to end the practice of canceling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, and not scheduling exams on the first two and last two days of Passover.

York adopted the practice in 1974 to respect the religious freedom of large numbers of Jewish students and staff who observed holidays that weren't enshrined in law.

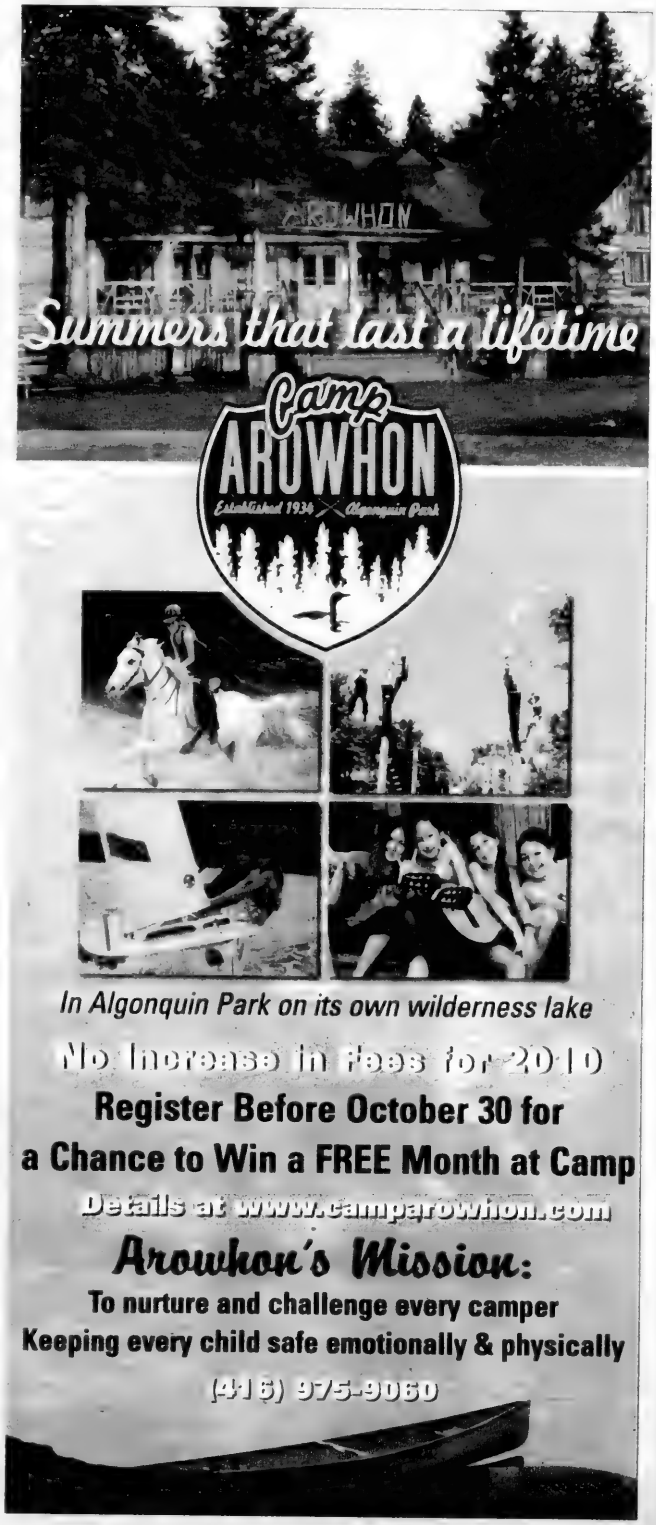
Since 2004 and until last year, history professor David Noble, who is Jewish, had been battling with York to end the practice, which he said is discriminatory because students of other faiths didn't get the same consideration.

In 2006, Noble filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission (OHRC), which ruled that the "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High Holy Days clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed," and in 2008, the commission voted to put the case before a human rights tribunal.

York spokesperson Alex Bylik told The CJN last year that York's senate, its governing body for academic policy, passed a resolution to end the practice starting this year, but he said the decision "had nothing to do with Prof. Noble's complaint."

The resolution stated that the decision was made because the "practice of not scheduling classes on Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur in the fall term regularly creates an imbalance in the progression of different sections of the same course and necessitates the addition of make-up days at the end of the term."

It added that the "religious observance policy" is enough to accommodate the students and faculty who are affected by the decision.



Cabinet minister urges 'new deal' for Israeli Arabs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

If Israel fails to grant its 1.2 million Arab citizens complete equal rights, they will become a festering problem, warns Israel's minister of minority affairs, Avishay Braverman.

In an interview last week, he declared that the "policy of neglect" toward Israel's Arab citizens that virtually every Israeli government has followed since statehood must end.

"We have to create a 'new deal' for Israeli Arabs," said Braverman, a Labor party member of Knesset whose visit to Toronto was arranged by the Inter-Agency Task Force, a New York-based coalition of North American Jewish organizations, foundations and private philanthropists committed to advancing civic equality in Israel.

Braverman, the former president of Ben-Gurion University of the Negev, said that improving conditions for Israeli Arabs represents one of three "strategic challenges" that Israel must meet to ensure its long-term survival.

In addition to forming a real partnership with Israeli Arabs, who constitute 20 per cent of Israel's population, Israel should work toward a two-state solution and overhaul its antiquated system of government, said Braverman, an economist and former top official at the World Bank.

"We have to move in a different direction," said Braverman, 61, whose brief appearance here was under the auspices of the Canada-Israel Committee.

According to Braverman, the only Israeli prime minister who attempted to fully integrate Israeli Arabs was Yitzhak Rabin, who was assassinated in 1995.

One of his successors, Ehud Olmert, acknowledged that Israel has not treated them properly, while the current prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, believes there is room for improvement in their status, even though he did not appoint a single Arab minister to his large cabinet.

In a reference to Israel's current coalition government, he said, "It's not a question of right or left."

Citing two right-wing Israeli figures who support him, Braverman mentioned Benny Begin, the son of the late prime minister Menachem Begin, and Moshe Arens, the former defence minister and ambassador to Washington.

"On this issue, they are liberal."

With Netanyahu's backing, Braverman has established a special Arab development fund of 160 million shekels to improve the generally depressed Israeli Arab economy and bring many more Arab women into the workforce.

Half the funds will come from the government, and the balance is expected to come from private donors in Israel and the Diaspora through investments in high-tech and medium-tech projects in Arab localities.

During the few hours he spent in Toronto, Braverman pitched his idea to a select group Jewish community activists.

Asked whether Jews would be inclined to invest in the Arab sector, he replied, "Some would, some wouldn't."

Fresh from a tour of cities in the United States, Braverman arrived in Toronto about a week after the Supreme Arab Monitoring Committee, a major Israeli Arab organization, announced that Israeli Arabs will hold a one day general strike on Oct. 1 to protest "continued state discrimination against its Arab citizens" and to mark the anniversary of the October 2000 riots, during which 13 Israeli Arabs were killed by police fire.

Braverman said that surveys indicate that almost one-quarter of Israeli Arabs reject Israel's existence. The vast majority, however, accept Israel as a fact and want very much to participate in Israeli society as equals.

"If we don't do what's right and appropriate, we will push young Israeli Arabs into the fundamentalist camp. We don't want an antagonistic minority."

Braverman dodged a question as to whether Israeli Arabs are second-class citizens, but he agreed that they don't get an equitable proportion of resources in such areas as municipal budgets and education.

Asked if he concurs with Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman's suggestion that Israeli Arabs should take a mandatory loyalty test to prove their allegiance, Braverman replied, "He's damaging the very delicate fabric between Jews and Arabs in Israel, and he's hurting Israel's international image."

Segueing to the peace process, Braverman said Israel has no alternative but to move to a two-state solution.

"We have to partition the Holy Land to avoid a one-state solution, which would be the end of Zionism."

Under a proposed peace agreement with the Palestinians, he said, Israel would pull out from more than 90 per cent of the West Bank, leaving it with at least 70 per cent of Jewish settlers on approximately four per cent of the land.

"The rest of the settlements would be removed."

In his view, most Palestinians support a two-state solution.

In the meantime, Braverman observed, Israel should develop the Galilee and the Negev.

Israel should also move closer to a presidential system of government to fulfil its huge potential and simplify its bureaucracy to encourage "a quantum leap of economic growth."

He is optimistic he can succeed. "I'll do what I can, and God and history will judge me."

Religious leaders unite in praising organ donation

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Toronto Board of Rabbis (TBR), in conjunction with the Trillium Gift of Life Network, the Catholic Archdiocese of Toronto and the Canadian Council of Imams, is spreading the word about the need to register as an organ or tissue donor.

Speaking at Trillium's interfaith press conference last week, Reform Rabbi Michal Shekel, TBR's executive director, told The CJN that all four major streams of Judaism – Reform, Conservative, Reconstructionist and Orthodox – view organ donation as a halachic imperative.

"The Toronto Board of Rabbis does not set halachah, but the four major movements have all stated that donating an organ is a mitzvah," she said, adding that there are differences between the denominations as to what donations are allowed.

Rabbi Shekel said that people who want to register as organ donors should consult a rabbi to find out what organs they can list for donation.

She said most Jews don't know organ donation is permissible and, in fact, encouraged.

"Jews are reluctant to donate, because they believe they're not allowed to. This is not true," she said. "It's disappointing the low levels of organ donors in our community, one with such a high level of education."

The TBR first teamed with the Trillium Gift of Life Network in 2005, when the network's newly installed president and CEO, Frank Markel – who is Jewish – approached one of Trillium's board members, Rabbi Reuven Bulka, who urged Markel to reach out to TBR's executive director at the time, Rabbi Aaron Flanzraich, to get the message out.

Soon after, Trillium and the TBR produced a set of brochures and posters for distribution to synagogues and Jewish organizations telling the community about the need for donors and clearing up misconceptions about Halachah on the matter.

"Our community prides itself on charity and compassion for other people," Markel said, adding that he hopes those traits will inspire action in the community.

According to Trillium's statistics, 1,651 Ontarians – and nearly 4,000 Canadians – are waiting for organ and tissue donations, the majority of whom need kidneys and lungs to save their lives.

Faith leaders from the Jewish, Catholic and Muslim communities gathered in Toronto last week to promote organ donation. From left are Imam Habeeb Alli from the Canadian Council of Imams; Rabbi Michal Shekel, executive director of the Toronto Board of Rabbis; Trillium Gift of Life Network president and CEO Frank Markel, and Moira McQueen, director of the Canadian Catholic Bioethics Institute.

[Andy Levy-Ajzenkopf photo]

In a statement, the TBR said that it "urges members of the Jewish community to register their consent to become organ donors. We also encourage families to help in life-saving transplant procedures by consenting to a loved one's post-mortem organ donation when a request is made by hospital staff."

Rabbi Shekel noted that all the rabbis on the board have registered as organ donors with the province.

This year, a new Trillium brochure aimed at the Jewish community – titled Organ Donation. it's a mitzvah – was printed just before Rosh Hashanah, in order for rabbis to refer to it from the pulpit during High Holiday services.

In it, the TBR affirms that "the value of human life, pikuach nefesh, is a cardinal value in Jewish law" and stresses the importance of registering as an organ donor in accordance with that principle.

The brochure also addresses questions about whether organ donation is allowable because of burial concerns, since Jewish law states that a body should be buried intact.

"Judaism clearly draws a distinction in the case of donating organs and tissues in order to save a life. The saving of a life is the most important of human activities. This is an overriding principle," it states.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

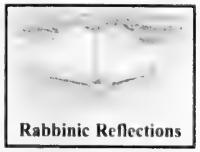
Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Today is the best of times

By RABBI MARK FRIEDMAN



Rabbinic Reflections

For many people, childhood would be considered as the golden age of life. After all, it's a time filled with enchantment and joy, make-believe and loveliness. It's a delightfully carefree time. But if we stop and think, the question may arise: were the days of childhood as sweet as all that?

The late playwright George Bernard Shaw is quoted as saying that the trouble with childhood is that it's wasted on children. Indeed, on the surface, it appears that childhood constitutes the most wonderful period in life. And yet, have you ever studied the emotions of a child when he doesn't want to go to school or she doesn't want to do her homework? What about the four-year-old boy who is refused a second helping of ice cream, or the seven-year-old girl who's not permitted to stay up until 11 p.m. to watch a mystery on TV? These children are very frustrated. They want more of something, and they can't have it. Is this the joyful, carefree time we imagined childhood to be?

Others claim youth is the happiest period of life. It's a time that possesses so much – energy, strength, vitality, adventure, romance, bravery and heroism. During World War II and all of the wars involving the State of Israel, young men, soldiers, took hand grenades, placed them in their bosoms, threw themselves under enemy tanks and were blown to bits.

But there's also a negative aspect to the younger years. Young men and women have to face the problem of getting into university and choosing a career. Many young people in serious relationships who would like to marry and raise families are prevented from realizing these blessings because of financial difficulties. So it's difficult to contend that youth is the happiest period of life.

Middle age deserves consideration as well. If one is sensible and has some financial reserve on which to draw, one can enjoy a number of comforts and pleasures, holidays and trips that were not affordable earlier in life.

Once again, though, one can point to a negative aspect of middle age. It's amazing how often I and my colleagues have been called upon to officiate at funerals for individuals who passed away in their late 40s or early 50s. The fact is that in their desire to succeed, people in their forties and fifties over-worry and overtax themselves, and they pay dearly for these excesses. Almost everyone is bothered by something. Some are spoiled by too much, others are obsessed by the perception that they have too little. No wonder middle age is sometimes characterized as the age of pills.

The senior years seem to be a wonderful period of life. One is surrounded by children, grandchildren, and even great-grandchildren. As a result of years of experience, the elderly are wise, mellow and serene. George Santayana said, at 82, "I have never been happier in my life than right now."

Yet, we know that the picture is not always so rosy. Most of the trouble is physical in origin. Many who reach the twilight of life are unhappy for yet another reason. They're distressed that they can't do certain things for themselves and have to depend on others to do these things for them.

What do Jewish sources teach about the best time of life? In the liturgy of the High Holidays, one word is repeated over and over again. The word is hayom – today. The best of times, Judaism teaches, is hayom – here and now. The greatest opportunity for goodness, service and piety is today.

Rabbi Friedman is a social worker in Ottawa and High Holidays rabbi of Congregation Sha'ar Shalom in Montreal.

Rosh Hashanah resolutions

Bookmarks
Bernard Baskin

How are we to order or govern our lives in the next 12 months? Consider the following.

• Spend some time alone. Rabbi Nachman of Bratslav taught, "Someone who does not reserve one hour every day for oneself is not human." Happy the person who can call a few hours a day his or her very own – away from the frenzied, insistent demands of family, business and community. Why should the din and tumult of society stifle the nobler promptings of the heart?

• Maintain your individuality. No two people are identical. Imitation may be the source of popularity, but not of greatness.

An ancient rabbi taught: "What a difference between an earthly king and the King of the Universe. A monarch mints coins upon which he stamps his image; they are all alike. But when the King of the Universe creates men and women in his image – untold millions of them – no two are exactly alike." God made us different; it is a divine right.

• Read a good book periodically. A house without books is like a room without windows. Bereft of the inspiration, information and delight of books, human growth and progress is slowed. We may not agree with the philosopher who wrote: "If all the crowns of Europe were placed at my disposal on condition that I should abandon my books and studies, I should spurn the crowns and stand by the books." But we must surely agree that the person who does not read good books has no advantage over the person who can't read them.

• Avoid a static mind. Life is all flux and alteration; immobility of thought or imagination means death. Life is not a having and a getting, but a being and a becoming. There is no hope for the satisfied person – and self-complacency is the companion of ignorance.

• Eliminate envy from your life. It is an ignoble passion that wastes time and energy and consumes its victims with hatred. Envy blinds us to our own virtues and blessings and magnifies those of our neighbour.

• Cultivate the art of tolerance. We are all passengers on the spaceship Earth together. Because we live within a stone's throw of one another is no reason why we must throw stones at one another. We must learn how to accept and tolerate the faults and foibles of others, if our own infirmities and errors are to be accepted in turn. Most of us have committed the Golden Rule to memory; when are we going to commit it to life?

• Make optimism rather than pessimism your daily philosophy. British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli cites as the national motto of England, "Something will turn up." Pollyannaism must be shunned, but optimism is the spur to all creativity. Ours may not be the best of all possible worlds, just the one we must make the best of. Two travellers, one a veteran and the other a novice, were climbing the Pyrenees. One night they were forced to sleep on a rock where the winds howled. The frightened novice called out, "I think this must be the end." "Oh no," said the veteran, "this is how dawn arrives in the Pyrenees."

• Adopt a spiritual attitude toward life. At its best, such a attitude says yes to the universe. An open hand accomplishes more than a closed fist. It means that despite its manifold secrets and mysteries, the world displays order and makes sense. Rabbi Akiba used to say, "Just as a door testifies that it has a carpenter, and a coat testifies that it has a weaver, so does the existence of the world testify that it has a Creator." Every tomorrow has two handles. We can take hold of it by the handle of anxiety or the handle of faith. The world may be hard to explain with God, but impossible to understand without him.

Jewish Life

I hope this column doesn't bore you

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

Perhaps the greatest threat to Jewish continuity and Judaic attachment isn't intermarriage, nor is it assimilation or the variegated temptations of modernity.

It may well be that all of these are the symptoms rather than the cause. As Erica Brown point out in a new book, the real enemy of Jewish survival is boredom.

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

The Jews I meet are bored everywhere – in school, in shul, listening to speeches, reading books. I'm sure there are many fine souls who garner excitement and meaningfulness each time they pray, and from each sermon they endure or each class they attend.

But for many people – and, too often, I am among them – these experiences frequently smell of a musty staleness, an unwillingness to venture forth beyond safe and hence uninteresting categories of thought and dialogue. As Brown notes, in Christianity the term for spiritual boredom is acedia, "the sense that religion is dry and unengaging. Acedia is not a sin, but failure to tackle acedia is."

This failure to admit that we're bored, – the willful denial of the stultifying effects of a Judaism that is often presented without complexity or risk, without raw encounter, without emotional depth, without intellectual nuance and without warmth – has led to a widespread alienation. Prayer services seem to drone on with little regard for inspiration. Torah classes parrot received knowledge as opposed to questioning for wisdom.

This communal disengagement is in no way limited to the usual stereotypical culprits – the unaffiliated or the "non-religious" (an often abused term). All corners of the Jewish world secretly harbour, or more overtly demonstrate, feelings of utter indifference and even antipathy to the standard versions of Torah that are repeatedly.continuously foisted upon them.

Many is the time when I can hardly hear my thoughts above the din of the Orthodox service I am attending. All of the various conversations taking place – almost in a continuous stream – before, during and after davening constitute a frank testimony to the lack of interest in the actual proceedings underway. I have a good friend who says he can't survive shul without bringing a number of books to read. The picture is less akin to a spiritual gathering and more to a course on survivalism, the ability to wait out the coming apocalypse with food, water and magazines.

But after rabbis and cantors and teachers get blamed, the stark reality hits – boredom is each person's responsibility and each person's opportunity. Out of the ashes of one's own spiritual dissatisfaction lies the path to renewal and to a new possibility for investigating what-religion might bring to my life that can't be duplicated in any other domain. Unless this question is confronted with a much greater degree of honesty, we are doomed to "groundhog day" – the repetition of our boredom.

Solutions are idiosyncratic. What's exciting for some is "flaky" for others. One person's scholarship may be another's irrelevance. But the common denominator must be the desire for individuals and collectives (from families to federations) to show a greater willingness to ask, "What are the sources of my boredom, and what can I/we do to save my inner life from this desperate state?"

Let's hope that future historians don't need to have recourse to the phrase "bored to death" as their epitaph for our generation.

Fast approaching!

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Eat. Don't eat. Eat.

Preparing for – and surviving – the Yom Kippur fast sounds easy enough. But the 25-hour non-eating, non-drinking marathon can take a toll on your body. And the accompanying hunger and thirst can sidetrack you into concentrating on your stomach when you really should be focusing on your soul.

The Jewish Highway

Today, some tips from the experts as you prepare for, endure and recover from the Yom Kippur fast.

Before the fast

• Taper off caffeine in the days preceding the fast. According to dietician Judy Baumann, "the nausea and headaches many people report while fasting have nothing to do either with food or fluid. They are usually the result of caffeine withdrawal." [bit.ly/fast02] As well, vary your meal schedule in the week before the fast. If you are extremely regular about your mealtimes, eating at different times tells your body not to expect to be fed at precisely 12:30 p.m. and 6 p.m. [bit.ly/fast03]

• Don't stuff yourself before the fast. Eat a normal meal that balances carbohydrates, fibre and protein.

• Make the final meal tasty. According to the Talmud, eating the day before Yom Kippur is a mitzvah equal to the mitzvah of fasting on the day of Yom Kippur. [bit.ly/fast13] That pre-fast meal doesn't have to be bland. Spices such as lemon or herbs are fine for fasting, but salt and monosodium glutamate should be reduced as much as possible. [bit.ly/ fast04] You can go with the tried-and-true chicken soup and potatoes or consider Sautéed Porcini Chicken and Arugula Salad. [bit.ly/fast01]

• If you have a medical condition, check with your doctor and rabbi before attempting to fast. The Jewish Diabetes Association website has important advice for diabetics about fasting, as well as how to prepare psychologically when you know that you will be eating while others are not. [bit.ly/fast05] Similarly, Jewish Pregnancy.org looks at the halachot of eating – or fasting – on the holiday. [bit.ly/fast06]

• Several websites warn people with eating disorders about the dangers of fasting. "These women do not have to be put at risk," says Rabbi Dovid Goldwasser of Congregation Bais Yitzchak in Brooklyn, N.Y. "God's most important commandment to the Jewish people is to respect their bodies." [bit.ly/fast07]

During the fast

• Don't hang around people who are talking endlessly about food and hunger. And avoid wearing clothing that will make you perspire, as this will cause your body to lose water. [bit.ly/fast08]

• Many people have the custom to smell fragrant spices on Yom Kippur, which are said to give strength to the person. [bit.ly/fast09]

• As your stomach begins to growl, think about the students of the Mir Yeshiva during the World War II. During the war, the yeshiva was able to escape Europe and relocate in Kobe, Japan. However, because of that country's proximity to the international date line, there was doubt about exactly when the fast should be observed while living in the Orient. So some members of the yeshiva took it upon themselves to fast for two days! [bit.ly/fast10]

After the fast

• Drink plenty of water to replenish fluids lost over the past 25 hours. And don't gorge yourself. [bit.ly/fast11]

• The Forward's food maven Matthew Goodman suggests you forget about the pickled herring and consider "a lovely bowl of lemony Avgolemono," a creamy egg-and-lemon soup that is a staple for the Yom Kippur break-fast among the Jews of Greece and Turkey. [bit.ly/fast12]

One last piece of advice: don't think of the daylong fast as a quick weight-loss scheme. As Richard Israel explains on the Jewish Outreach Institute's website, "An average adult will burn 2,000 to 2,500 calories, about two-thirds of a pound, during a 24-hour fast. It doesn't take long at all to put that back on again. A couple of pieces of cheesecake and you will be just about even." [bit.ly/fast14]

Have a tzom kal – an easy fast!

United Church funded Jewish anti-Zionist group in '08

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian Jewish community leaders say they're "shocked" after revelations last week that the United Church of Canada gave $900 to a fringe anti-Zionist Jewish group that has repeatedly called for boycotts of Israel.

According to the church, the money was used to help finance a March 2008 conference in Toronto by the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians, which led to the founding of the group Independent Jewish Voices.

The revelations come on the heels of a recently concluded national United Church convention that considered and defeated controversial resolutions calling for a boycott of Israel.

In a letter to The CJN last week, the church, Canada's largest Protestant denomination, admitted it could have been more careful in doling out the money.

The grant was intended "to support the participation of people engaged in dialogue between Jewish, Muslim, and Palestinian networks around options for peace in the Middle East. This is consistent with our longstanding tradition of support for interfaith initiatives for justice and peace," United Church spokesperson, Rev. Bruce Gregersen, told The CJN in a written statement last week.

"We recognize there are extreme positions on all sides of this issue and acknowledge that greater scrutiny may have been necessary in this case. We are examining our approval mechanisms to ensure that all grants are consistent with our values and goals," the statement added.

The church's donation helped defray 10 per cent of the event's costs, including travel expenses for three speakers, but should not be considered seed money for the new alternative Jewish group, a United Church official told the National Post last week.

Diana Ralph, a founder of the IJV, disputed that figure, saying the grant covered only seven per cent of the cost of the conference.

Benjamin Shinewald, Congress' national executive director and general counsel, said "this is an extraordinary and shocking revelation.

"That [IJV] couldn't raise $900 from the national Jewish community of Canada and had to go outside the community to do so… That speaks to just how marginal an organization this is."

Shinewald added that as of last week, the church and Congress had not yet "dialogued" about this latest issue.

"Even though our relations with the church are not as good as we'd like them to be… we did not expect that they would be funding the creation of an organization whose objective is to drive a wedge into the Jewish community and to attack the dearest values of the community," he said.

But implying that the grant to IJV was non-political is "preposterous," Shinewald said. "They were funding a group that wants to radically affect a change in Canadian politics. You cannot say that providing money to fly in speakers to a political conference, where a rump Jewish organization is created… that you are not engaging in politics. That's nonsensical."

The CJC and the church battled recently over resolutions calling for a boycott of Israel that were put forward at the church's recent triennial conference, held this past summer in Kelowna, B.C.

The measures were defeated at the national level, but the United Church "encouraged" individual members and congregations to "study ways to end the occupation of the disputed Palestinian territories."

IJV members were present at the Kelowna conference and had an information booth in a "well-placed" location, said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

At the time, Farber assumed group members had come on their own to counter Congress' presence. He said he now questions that conclusion and wonders if the group was invited and what its actual status was at the conference, in light of the recent news about the grant.

"Was the IJV just a front for anti-Israel sentiment in the United Church of Canada, or were they just one of many observers there," Shinewald asked rhetorically. "It's not clear to us right now, because the United Church is a founding partner of the IJV."

Though the church attempted to distance itself from its relationship with the IJV, Shinewald wondered if it truly understood who it was dealing with when it gave the money to the group.

Beyond criticizing Israel and advocating boycotts of the country, Ralph's public expressions about the Jewish state and "the Israel lobbies" have bordered on full-fledged conspiracy theory.

Speaking in June to a gathering at an undisclosed church in Ottawa – available in a post on YouTube last week – she told an audience that Canadians are now seeing the "Likudization of Canada."

In the video, Ralph voiced her beliefs that Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu helped the United States shape its strategy against the "war on terror" before 9/11 – a concept she claims Netanyahu invented in 1979. She also rails against how Israel lobbyists now wage their own war on terror "against Muslims" and how they have encouraged the United States to attack Iraq and are now doing the same on Iran.

"Israel has always served as a strategic asset to various imperial powers, most recently the United States," she said.

Reached by e-mail, Ralph refused to divulge how many members belong to the IJV. When asked what association the group has with the United Church, Ralph wrote "none." When asked if it was invited to the church's conference this past summer, she wrote "no."

She also questioned the purpose of The CJN's inquiries, asking: "Why this non-story about a small donation over a year ago is being sensationalized at this time. Is it intended to divert attention from the Goldstone Report condemning Israeli (and Palestinian) war crimes?"

In the YouTube video, Ralph called pro-Israel advocates and agencies in Canada and the United States "an unholy alliance between the world's military and corporate powers, right-wing Christian-Zionists – including [Prime Minister] Stephen Harper – and pro-Israel Jewish organizations working under the control of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy. These are the masters of war."

Farber said Congress plans to send a letter to the national leadership of the church immediately after the High Holidays. It will express "in the strongest possible terms" a request for a meeting to discuss the church's association with the IJV.

Ben-Gurion Society program aids the students

"Members of the BGS visited Ethiopia and Israel in 2006, and on that visit, they saw Ono Academic College and were impressed by the fact that it offers scholarships to Ethiopian students on a higher level than any other college in the country," says Stephen Gaerber, vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver and the initiator of this project.

"The group was moved by this, and the program was begun, to start funding scholarships for academically qualified Ethiopian students to study business and law at the college."

There are approximately 177 Ethiopian students at Ono Academic College, where the student population is 8,000. Tuition for a three-year degree is 28,000 shekels (about $7,500 US). In the two years since this fundraising project began, BGS has funded almost 10 degrees, says Mindy Ecklove, national director of young leadership at UIA Federations Canada.

"Last year we decided to take this project a step beyond the financial, because in Israel, even if you have a degree, it can be hard to get a job without connections," she says. "So we started a volunteer-driven internship program in Canada for students."

In 2008, three students visited Toronto, while this year, two were sent to Vancouver and two to Toronto, the latter from the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya.

As he reflected on his month in Vancouver just days before his return to Israel, Naga said his experience was "excellent. We've had a chance to learn from the best, and for me, that meant being around 100 lawyers working together at Lawson, Lundell, Lawon and McIntosh. But also meeting members of the Vancouver Jewish community has changed my perspective," he said. "People here are more Jewish even than those in Israel."

Naga said his time with fellow Ethiopian and lawyer Ben Gabriel, as well as Irv Laskin at Lawson Lundell, was inspiring. "Seeing the way they think, their approach to problem solving has been so beneficial, far more helpful than studying legal texts," he said.

> 'Meeting members of the Vancouver Jewish community has changed my perspective'

Naga left a small farming village in Ethiopia's Gondar province at the age of five and, in 1984, was among the first to make aliyah in Operation Moses. He and his family made their way by foot from Ethiopia to Sudan over four months, surviving attacks by bandits and starvation that claimed the lives of many of their fellow travellers en route.

Being the first recruits, they found themselves in absorption centres that were ill prepared for their arrival. But the Naga family forged ahead, found work and settled in their new home. Erez became a sergeant in the Golani combat unit of the Israel Defence Forces, and when he completed his service, travelled extensively in Asia.

His plan is to finish law school and start a business degree at Ono College right away. "We have so many lawyers in Israel that you need something more," he says. "I'll practise law initially, but I want to start a business where I am the boss. I don't want to work for anyone else."

Trunch says she has always wanted to be a lawyer. "Ono is a prestigious academic college, and this degree will allow me to enter mainstream Israeli society," she says.

Her move from Ethiopia to Israel came a decade after that of Naga, in Operation Solomon in 1994. She spent a year in an immigrant absorption centre, served in the army and worked in a variety of jobs before starting her studies.

"I'm so thankful to the organizations that have funded my studies," she says earnestly. "What they're doing by giving us education is a great thing, and we pass it forward by mentoring new Ethiopian immigrants and acting as role models. I want to thank those organizations for helping us realize our dreams and encourage them to continue doing what they do."

Naga agrees. "Many Vancouver Jews I've spoken to feel bad about not being in Israel, but they need to understand that they're doing great things from here," he says.

"They're defending Israel from here, giving us a voice, and the country needs that. Vancouver's Jewish community should feel good, because they're doing a fantastic job here."

Clarification

The article "Tel Aviv mayor dismisses film fest protest" (Sept. 17) may have given an incorrect impression as the result of a comment by Tel Aviv Mayor Ron Huldai about the Toronto International Film Festival's choice of Tel Aviv for its City to City program.

"There was no Israeli official involvement in the decision to spotlight Tel Aviv in City to City, no Israeli funding and no involvement in programming," Huldai said in a statement to The CJN.

Vancouver federation launches annual campaign

By LAUREN KRAMER
Pacific Correspondent

VANCOUVER — The Jewish Federation of Greater Vancouver (JFGV) launched its annual campaign last week with a target of $7.35 million, up $15,000 from last year's campaign.

"We have more people in need in our Jewish community than we've had in past years," said Judi Korbin, chair of the annual federation campaign. "There are people who've lost their jobs, lost the ability to put their children through schooling and can no longer look after their parents the way they want to, and we're seeing those numbers increase in the various agencies we support."

At the campaign launch at Vancouver's Congregation Schara Tzedeck, Korbin spoke of the importance of Jews sensitizing themselves to the different levels of need in the community.

The guest speaker was Rabbi Bradley Artson, an author and dean of the Ziegler School of Rabbinic Studies at the American Jewish University. "I like people to walk away with the message that in times of financial struggle, the core values of Jewish tradition and of community are more important rather than less," he said.

"For people whose identity is their income, many have watched their assets disappear, and it's harder to place your faith in financial wealth and the kinds of perks that come with it. At times like this, what remains is caring for others, linking to something larger than your own story."

Rabbi Artson referred to a culture of "genteel charity in which the perfect deign to give to the poor.

"There's no perfect and no unworthy, just us," he said. "This campaign is your moment to stand up and say, 'I will not live in a hate-filled world.' Federation is the front lines of the battle to teach us to stand together."

The JFGV supports 27 agencies locally and abroad, among them Jewish Family Services, local Jewish day schools, agencies that help people with developmental and physical challenges and Jewish summer camps.

In an interview, Korbin emphasized that the JFGV has reduced its overhead by 15 per cent, and asked the 27 agencies with whom it collaborates to reduce their costs too. "This way, of the money we raise, more of it will actually help individuals in need," she says.

"We want to ensure there's a critical social safety net for our community members, that education is still accessible and that we can help Jews stay connected to our community. That's the goal of our campaign."

B.C. filmmaker 'takes stand for Israel'

VANCOUVER — Doug Kooy is a Canadian filmmaker who believes Canadians need to know the real story of life in Israel, not the story of war, bombs and fighting portrayed in the media.

He made it his business to try and tell that story of everyday life in Israel, spending $800,000 to produce The Original Promise, a documentary that launched briefly in March 2009. After the first showing at Vancouver's Ridge Theatre, Kooy determined that additional material was necessary, so he added more interviews in a series of bonus sections and is finally ready to release the film.

The impetus for The Original Promise came out of a conversation Kooy had with Paul Michaels, the director of communications of the Canada-Israel Committee (who is also a CJN columnist), not long after Kooy returned from his first-ever trip to Israel. "I told him, you're doing a terrible job of telling the story of Israel and what it's really like there, and that we in North America need to see more of what Israel's really like," Kooy recalls.

"He told me I'd be the perfect person to do that job of telling the story, and though I laughed it off at the time, I thought it was a good idea," Kooy says.

A couple of years later, the timing was right and Kooy started searching for a partner to produce the documentary he wanted to show North American audiences. He knew he needed to partner with someone from the younger generation, preferably someone Jewish who was coming to terms with her or his religious identity. He found that partner in Farrah Aviva, 25, an actress from Kelowna, B.C., with bright eyes and a spirit open to adventure and exploration.

Kooy and Aviva travelled to the Holy Land for 21 days in 2008, without accepting sponsorship from anyone. They interviewed some 12 citizens of the country, including Rabbi Yisrael Meir Lau, chief rabbi of Tel Aviv and the Metulla mayor among others. The Original Promise is a series of interviews with these people, offering their perspectives on Israel and snapshots of daily life.

"This is the Israel that's not being reported in the media," Kooy says earnestly. "In North America, we say we support Israel, but what do we really know about it? It's so politically charged the way it's portrayed in the newspaper."

While spending time in Israel, Kooy was struck by the values Israelis share with North Americans, particularly the country's democratic nature, its women's rights and its freedom of religion.

While he admits there's no such thing as an unbiased documentary, Kooy and Aviva tried their utmost to stay away from hot political issues. "We didn't want to get into the Palestinian question," Kooy admits. "But I felt someone non-Jewish needed to take a stand for Israel. In spite of what the world thinks, Israel is making huge contributions in science, medicine and high tech. Why is that not being mentioned?"

'The ground vanished beneath me,' Goldwasser's widow says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The news on July 12, 2006, was better than expected, Karnit Goldwasser said: Israeli officials informed her and her family that her husband, Ehud (Udi), had been kidnapped and was not necessarily dead.

"When we heard he was kidnapped, we started to laugh, to smile, to hug," she told an audience of about 200 last week at Beth Israel Beth Aaron synagogue.

"At that point, we knew what we had to do. We had to work to get back Udi."

Sadly, it was not to be. Not until July 16, 2008 – two years almost to the day after her husband and Eldad Regev, both IDF soldiers, were believed kidnapped by Hezbollah terrorists near the Lebanese border – did she or anyone else know for a fact that her husband, who was only 30, and Regev were dead.

They were unceremoniously returned to Israeli soil, in a prisoner exchange.

"I knew [his fate] when you did," the young widow told the audience. "It was a very sad day in Israel. Everyone was crying."

Still, they were home, and they would be buried in their beloved country, two years after Karnit Goldwasser, her family and the Regev family made it their mission to determine the fate of Udi and Regev, as well as of Gilad Schalit, a soldier who had been abducted by Hamas terrorists in a separate incident a few weeks earlier in Gaza.

Schalit's fate is still unknown.

In a story she has told to Jewish groups many times over the past year – she also spoke the next day to students at Bialik High School – Goldwasser, poised and articulate, poignantly described how life changed for her so fatefully from the moment she heard about an incident "in the north" while cooking in her kitchen.

Karnit Goldwasser

Goldwasser said her husband, ironically in retrospect, was relieved he would be on "safe duty" in Israel's north.

The first reports of an incident there came at 9 a.m. Goldwasser continued cooking.

She then tried to reach Udi by cellphone, to no avail. There were reports of casualties, but Udi was not listed among them.

"The ground vanished beneath me," Goldwasser said. "When you know someone is killed, you know how to react, but what do you did when someone is kidnapped?

Following the advice of Israeli officials, Goldwasser went to be with family in Nahariya, which was being rained on from Lebanon by Hezbollah's Katyusha rockets. She then had to drive home again because the army needed a DNA sample of her husband.

Then the two-year mission began. She immediately contacted Tel Aviv lawyer Ori Slonim, famous for securing the release of Israeli hostages. He wanted to meet "sometime next week," but reading her sense of urgency, quickly agreed to see her the same day.

Goldwasser travelled – to London, to Paris, around the world – asking governments to help her. The refrain was repeated over and over: she told world leaders that "with terror, no one can get anything."

Ears were sympathetic, but there was little action. The Red Cross, she said, "did nothing."

Goldwasser said she spent the two years sleeping with her cellphone and two regular lines, her laptop at hand. Every two hours, she checked for updates on the Israeli website, ynet.

"I realized I was doing this 24 hours a day, seven days a week," she said.

For a little respite, she decided to cycle. Initially, she was stricken with guilt, but she came to realize that the exercise would help her maintain her energy to carry on the mission.

She tried to normalize her life, or at least make it appear normal, while the mission went on: she went to her best friend's wedding, celebrated the holidays, tried to put on a happy face so as not to detract from others' simchahs.

She was not afraid to ask for help from others, she said. "Only the strongest people ask for help."

Then, in July 2008, it was over. According to Arlazar Eliashiv, president of the Canadian Zionist Federation's eastern region who came to befriend the family and organized last week's event, there is divided opinion over when exactly Udi Goldwasser and Regev died. Most now seem to think it was the moment the incident happened, when their Humvee, near the Israeli village of Zar'it, was struck by anti-tank rockets. Others think they might have been killed some hours later, while in captivity.

"We may never know," Eliashiv said.

This much, however, is known, new Israeli vice-consul Avi Lewis said: Karnit Goldwasser is "truly a remarkable figure," with an indomitable spirit that has allowed her "to pick up the pieces" after the tragedy.

She continues to help determine the fate of Schalit.

The synagogue's Rabbi Reuben Poupko said that after the tragedy, Goldwasser carried on "with elegance, poise and courage.

"We prayed every night for [the soldiers'] safe return, but it was not to be."

מה נבקש לראש השנה

אז אם אתם קוראים עכשיו את שישאר בינינו-שתהיה לכם שנה שבה תמצאו יותר זמן למשפחה, לחברים הטובים ולעצמכם. מה עוד אפשר לבקש?

האבל של משפחת רמון

יש משהו מאוד ישראלי באבל הלאומי על בנו של האסטרונאוט שנהרג בתאונת אימונים. אבל יש משהו מאוד ישראלי ומגעיל בחשמנות שמלווה אירועים עצובים כאלה.

עיתון מערב מגלה כי רונה רמון , שהיתה בבירה ברמת גן, ראתה דרך החלון עיתונאים וניידות שידור מתעדדים סביב ביתה בשרם הגיעו אלוה בביגי קצין העיר. היא הבינה מיד שהרע מכל קרה. ולמי שיש בן מיים-המשמעות די ברורה. כך היא ישבה בביתה בוכה.

פרוצת לשאול, מוכה לדמיה בדלת, ממרחק של אלפי קילומטרים עברו בי בושה וחרון כשחשבתי על הדרכת האלה שלה.

העיתונאים יגידו שהם פשוט עשו את עבודתם וש"זכות הציבור לדעת" קודמת לכל. ואני אומר שהם תלשני זבל מהסדר המגעיל ביותר שנציגי על כדור הארץ. אירוה מקום הם כבר רצו למצוא שם? אשה וילדים בוכים? הוברים שפוטים ומתייפחים?

אלה הם אותם עיתונאים שימנו ופרסמו את תיבנו של המתק שכתב אוצאמה שהורצא מן הכותל. הם משקפים תרבות מחפירה, חסרת כל כבוד, רגש או מקצועיות. אם השנה הקרובה תביא אותם לנסות את הארוות שלהם-העולם ירגיש טוב יותר. אבל שישאר בינינו.

Distortion from a Saudi, hypocrisy from Klein

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A recent New York Times opinion piece by Turki al-Faisal, former Saudi ambassador to the United States, highlights why there has been no progress toward Middle East peace by Saudi Arabia.

In "Land First, Then Peace," (Sept. 13), al-Faisal referred to United Nations Security Council Resolution 242, which has been the guiding principle of the Middle East peace process since 1967, but he badly distorted its intent.

Resolution 242 calls for Israel's withdrawal from land acquired in the 1967 war, but only in the context of peace and security guarantees from its Arab neighbours, as happened in the peace treaties with Egypt and Jordan. Al-Faisal omitted the essential Arab obligation to the peace-making process, accurately conveyed by the familiar phrase "land for peace." But this logically means "if peace, then land," not, as al-Faisal would have it, "land first, then peace." It's a crucial – not merely semantic – distinction.

This widespread and persistent distortion has spread far beyond the Saudis and other Arab and Palestinian communities, and is tenaciously held by western groups who support the Palestinian cause. The result is a setback for the peace process.

You might expect activist Naomi Klein to at least know where she stands on the issues she advocates most stridently about. Apparently not. As noted in last week's column, Klein freely admitted not long ago in the Nation magazine that she and her crowd deliberately "single out" Israel among all countries in the world for boycott, divestment and sanction (BDS) because, as a "tactic," it's easy to pick on a "small" and economically vulnerable country where such a campaign "could actually work."

Yet when she appeared on CBC Radio's Q (Sept. 11), while defending her decision to protest the Toronto International Film Festival's (TIFF) spotlight on Tel Aviv, she told host Jian Ghomeshi that she's not picking on Tel Aviv or Israel. Flatly contradicting what she wrote in the Nation, she said: "The idea that I single out Israel is completely untrue."

That's not her only self-contradiction.

While insisting that she wasn't calling for a boycott of the Israeli films at TIFF, Klein nonetheless admitted she wants the protest to have "an effect" on film festivals – to send "a message" to festival programmers to not get involved "in conflict areas like the Middle East" where one side (meaning the side she disdains, Israel) is showcased.

Klein's intent is clear – to send a chill to festival heads. Don't highlight countries that meet with her disapproval, or she will embark on a similar campaign to damage the reputation of your event.

Klein's hypocrisy on the subject of Israel extends further. For example, she depicts Israel's January 2009 military operation against Hamas in Gaza as a bombardment of innocent Palestinians, done without provocation. (This is equivalent to saying World War II began with the allies' invasion of France on D-Day in 1944.) Anything Klein can say to demonize and delegitimize Israel, including the "apartheid" slander, is apparently fair in her eyes.

Yet Klein, who never seems to shy away from boldly expressing her political views, was uncharacteristically evasive when questioned about whether, in effect, she supports Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state.

In an article in the Globe and Mail (Oscar-winning rabbi stokes TIFF tiff, Sept. 11), reporter Michael Posner asked Klein whether, as a final resolution of the Palestinian-Israeli conflict, she favours a one-state (i.e. no Jewish state) or two-state solution. Klein said, basically, that she has no opinion: "It should be up to Israeli and Palestinian negotiators to decide what kind of states or state they want. I have never advocated for any position on it and am not about to start."

Given her actions, one would have to be incredibly generous, to say the least, to take Klein at her word.

Opening celebration at Sherman Campus

The Tomorrow Campaign: continuing our tradition of building for the future

By Daniel Horowitz

The history of Jewish Toronto is the history of builders. Since the days of our nation's first census, when there were just 157 Jews living in Toronto, we have been building. Building homes and synagogues, schools and hospitals. Building bridges with our neighbours, building communities with our landsmen, and building brighter futures for generations to come.

Fleeing the persecution and pogroms of Eastern Europe, waves of Jewish immigrants arrived in Canada, particularly Toronto, throughout the 1800s. Those who had already established new lives here helped the "greeners," opening doors, finding them work and helping them to help themselves. Regardless of where they came from, or the hardships they faced, these newcomers all shared a common vision: to live in a city – to help build a city – that was safe and welcoming to all.

As the Jewish community grew, the need for better organization, collaboration and infrastructure became apparent. In 1917, Toronto's first Jewish federation – the Federation of Jewish Philanthropies – was incorporated, bringing community fundraising under one umbrella. By 1930, the YMHA (Young Men's Hebrew Association) was established, followed in 1953 by the Bloor Street "Y" at Bloor and Spadina. At a time when doors were closed to the Jews of Toronto, they simply built their own, walked right through, and never looked back.

As Jewish life began moving northward up the Bathurst Street corridor, the community leadership, its visionaries and philanthropists, began planning and building for the future. It was clear that to foster a healthy, vibrant and engaged Jewish community, new facilities would be needed. On a chilly December day in 1958, a groundbreaking ceremony was held at a new 27-acre site on Bathurst, north of Sheppard. And on May 14, 1961, the "Northern Branch" of the YM-YWHA opened its doors, featuring beautiful outdoor and indoor swimming pools, playfields for team sports, an indoor track and gym, a nursery, and more.

In the spring of 1977, the scope and size of the facilities blossomed. Vastly expanding its reach and mandate, the Bathurst and Sheppard "Central Campus" became a cultural hub – an exciting destination for dance, theatre, music and art – as the doors to the new Koffler Centre of the Arts and the Leah Posluns Theatre opened.

The last in the family of buildings to be constructed on site was the Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services. Opened in July of 1983, the unique, stilted structure was envisioned as a homebase for the various agencies serving the Jewish world locally and around the globe. Not surprisingly, the Lipa Green Building quickly became the heart of our city's organized Jewish community.

At each stage in the growth of Jewish Toronto, a new generation of leaders has boldly forged ahead, taking on the awesome task of building for a better Jewish future. With the creation of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow on April 16, 2000, the torch was passed yet again. Today, the Tomorrow Campaign is in the midst of the largest infrastructure project our community"– or any Canadian community – has ever known. From the downtown Miles Nadal JCC and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, to Sherman Campus, and north to Vaughan's Joseph & Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, we are literally changing the landscape of our city.

With the September 16, 2009 official opening of the Prosserman JCC's Donald Gales Family Pavilion and the newly enhanced Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services, UJA Federation – through its Tomorrow Campaign - continues the tradition of one generation building for the next.

ushers in new era of Jewish life in Toronto

Torontonians of all ages, backgrounds, will benefit from Sherman Campus

By Barbi Green

ears of planning, building and dreaming came to fruition on Wednesday afternoon with the opening celebration of the first phase of Sherman Campus. The highly-anticipated event marked the official opening of the Prosserman JCC at the new Donald Gales Family Pavilion and the expansion of the Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services.

Before a capacity crowd in the Lipa Green Centre's new Tamari Family Hall, donors to Sherman Campus were honoured for playing a pivotal role in bringing the beautiful 27-acre site (on Bathurst north of Sheppard) to life. Among the more than 200 attendees were Toronto Mayor David Miller and Vaughan MPP Greg Sorbara.

"For the past 10 years, through the vision of Jewish Toronto Tomorrow and ultimately, the Tomorrow Campaign, we have followed proudly in the footsteps of our ancestors," said Peter Cohen, Chair of the Sherman Campus Development Committee. "Like the visionaries and leaders who built for us, we are recognizing and boldly addressing the need for infrastructure and accessible services to support and nurture present and future generations of Jewish Toronto."

"This is truly a great day for our community," said Barry Sherman. "Looking back ten years ago when we launched this initiative, it was a daunting task, but the response from our community was tremendous as they, too, wanted to ensure a strong and vibrant Jewish community for their children."

Renovations and enhancements to the Lipa Green Centre include the creation of a vast, state-of-the-art Conference Centre on the building's main level. The new Prosserman JCC features programs for seniors, the David & Esther Freiman Early Childhood Education Centre, the Koffler Centre of the Arts, a culinary arts studio, the Goldie Fitness Centre, family programming and a host of cultural and social activities.

"The vision behind having the Gales Pavilion as the first building to open on Sherman Campus was so that we could continue to serve all members of the community who have made the JCC such an integral part of their lives for so many years," said David Koschitzky, Chair, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

"It's truly remarkable to see just how far our Jewish community has come in the last decade," said UJA Federation President & CEO, Ted Sokolsky. "When the Tomorrow Campaign was launched – as Jewish Toronto Tomorrow – in 2000 at the Kiever Shul, nobody could have anticipated just how much our city's Jewish infrastructure would change, improving lives of not only Jews, but the community-at-large, all of whom benefit from our new campuses downtown, midtown, and in Vaughan."

The next phases of Sherman Campus will include a 64,000 square foot Sports Complex, The National Centre for Jewish Heritage, the Sarah and Chaim Neuberger Holocaust Education Centre and a new Koffler Centre for the Arts and Leah Posluns Theatre.

Chabad gets infrastructure cash for new centre

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Despite short notice, about 100 people crowded into the Chabad centre in south Winnipeg on Sept. 13 to celebrate the announcement that the provincial and federal governments are each giving Chabad $320,000 toward construction of a new community and education centre in the southern part of the city.

"It was tremendous news," Rabbi Yacov Simmonds said of the federal infrastructure grant, which was matched by the province. "We only learned about the grant just before Shabbat. It is a major boost in our efforts to build our new centre."

The construction of a new 17,000-square-foot Chabad centre in south Winnipeg will be the first new Jewish institution to be built in Winnipeg since the opening of the Asper Jewish Community campus in 1997 – and the first new religious institution to be built in the community since the construction of the first Chabad centre in north Winnipeg more than 30 years ago.

About 10 years ago, with the majority of Winnipeg's Jewish population already having shifted from north to south Winnipeg, Chabad opened a south Winnipeg branch in a small, rented storefront space.

Chabad bought the land for a larger centre in the largely Jewish and affluent River Heights area four years ago and kicked off a fundraising campaign in May 2007 with a dinner honouring members of the Rich family, who are strong supporters of Chabad in Winnipeg.

The overall project is expected to cost more than $3 million, said Rabbi Simmonds, who has led the fundraising campaign.

He expects construction to start on the first phase shortly and take about a year to complete. It will have 14,000 square feet of space. "We were originally going to build the smaller portion first, but the consensus was that we should build the larger portion instead and add 3,000 square feet more at a later date," Rabbi Simmonds said.

The new building will house a multi-purpose social hall/lecture hall/synagogue, along with classrooms, a library and a small gym for Chabad's preschool program and summer and winter camp.

"We have been using rented space and rabbis' homes for our programs up to now," Rabbi Simmonds said. "We will be able to consolidate all our programs in our new building and also run programs concurrently."

The new building, he said, should be able to accommodate 350 to 400 people, compared to the 65 to 75 who can be comfortably squeezed into the present rented space.

"It took a group of forward-thinking visionaries to get us to where we are today," Rabbi Simmonds says.

He saved his highest praise for Rabbi Avroham Altein, Chabad's leader in Winnipeg, who arrived here in 1970 and built up the organization from scratch.

"Without Rabbi Altein's commitment, guidance and leadership, none of this would have happened," Rabbi Simmonds said.

Congress presents brief to committee

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A link between the high proportion of Middle Eastern immigrants to the province and anti-Israel sentiment is being drawn by Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC) in its brief to the Canadian Parliamentary Coalition to Combat Anti-Semitism (CPCCA).

"For the past 15 years, in exercising the power to select immigrants, Quebec has given priority to immigration from the Maghreb in order to favour French speakers," the brief states. Today, roughly 20 per cent of immigrants to Quebec arrive from the Maghreb, it says, citing 2007 data from the immigration ministry.

"By no means do we suggest that all immigrants from the Middle East are anti-Semitic. However, the domestic fallout in Quebec from international events, such as the Lebanese [August 2006] and Gaza [January 2009] conflicts, is such that a higher proportion of individuals in Quebec attribute the conflicts to Israel's actions in the Middle East."

QJC notes that groups calling for the removal of Hezbollah and Hamas from Canada's terrorist list have "found greater sympathy in Quebec than elsewhere in the country."

Generally, QJC describes the Quebec of today as "a welcoming and egalitarian society," yet, it says, anti-Semitism still exists. Ignorance is the main reason people have stereotypically negative attitudes towards Jews, it believes.

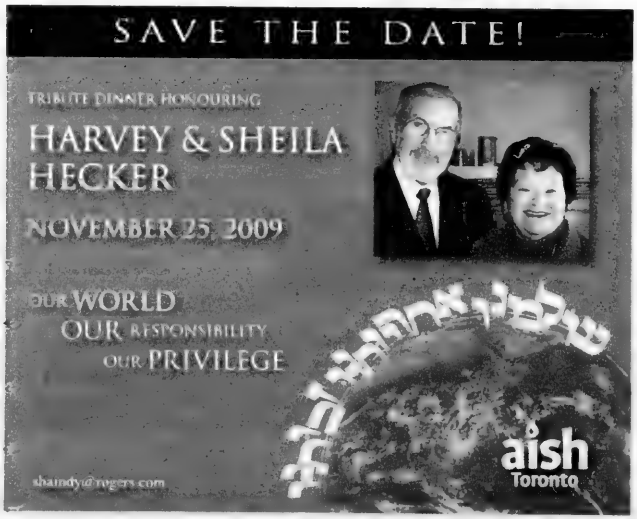
Greater contact between Jews and other Quebecers, especially those living in rural areas, would likely have an impact in changing misperceptions of Jews, it suggests.

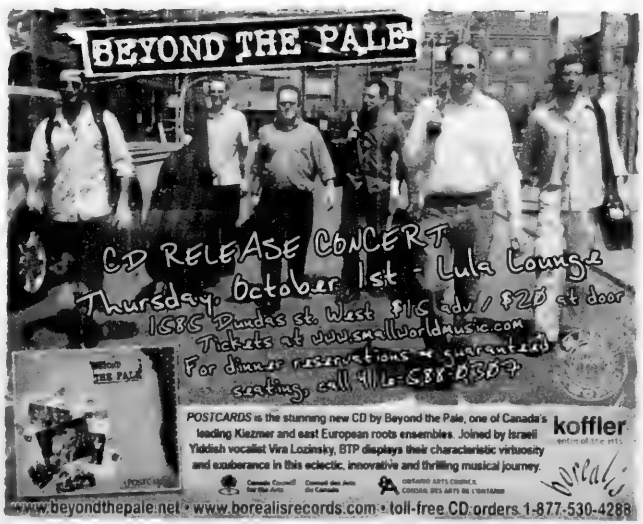
More troubling to QJC is "the new anti-Semitism" which is "disguised as anti-Zionism" and "the demonization of Israel."

"Automatic, one-sided condemnation of Israel's unsubstantiated 'illegal' actions in Gaza and Lebanon has become the mantra of numerous Quebec institutions, especially – and most ironically – those that describe themselves as favouring the left, i.e., trade unions, academic associations, [and] the Quebec Federation of Women."

The CPCCA grew out of the inaugural conference of international parliamentarians who gathered in London last February to discuss how to fight what is seen as the increasing problem of global anti-Semitism.

The all-party Canadian committee, chaired by Ontario Conservative MP Scott Reid, launched its inquiry in June with a call for written submissions from the public on anti-Semitism. Aug. 31 was the deadline. The committee plans to begin hearing witness testimony this fall.





Medical robotic fly really gets under your skin

Miniature device designed to diagnose diseases

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
ISRAEL21C

First there was a snake-shaped robot that's sent in through a small incision so patients could avoid open-heart surgery. Then there were robotic marching ants that can inspect water pipes for leaks.

Now comes the latest research from the robotics laboratory at the Technion – Israel Institute of Technology: creepy crawly fly-like robots that get under your skin for very good medical reasons.

The researchers have created a miniature robotic fly that can crawl through your arteries and veins to diagnose diseases and deliver drugs to infected tumours.

Prof. Moshe Shaham, head of the robotics laboratory, and his team developed the miniature robotic fly – about 0.04 inches in diameter – to enter the body to diagnose diseases and conditions such as blocked arteries and deliver drugs to infected tumors.

The miniature robotic fly created at the Technion in Israel is designed to diagnose diseases and deliver drugs to infected tumours.

Based on micro-electro-mechanical systems (MEMS) technology, the tiny robot crawls through arteries and veins. It's steered by a magnet that's moved over the body from the outside. Its miniscule outstretched arms grip the sides of the blood vessel walls as it zeroes in on its targeted location.

Currently in the early prototype stages, the researchers plan to scale down the robot to one-tenth its current diameter – about 100 microns. That will bring it a step closer to much less invasive diagnosis and treatment.

"We see that more and more miniature devices and research in the medical field are going in this direction: less invasive medicine and targeted drugs," Shaham said.

Partners in the research include Dr. Nir Shvalb from Israel's Ariel College and Dr. Oded Solomon from the Technion.

"This accomplishment of miniaturization is without precedent, as is the ability to control the robot's activity for unlimited periods of time, for any medical procedure," Solomon said.

"We hope this discovery can be used to improve the quality of care for diseases and many other conditions," he added.

Shaham added that mini medical devices are the future of medicine: "We will see more and more [medical practitioners] working in this way. Of course, targeted medicine can release drugs in a specific location. We try to work along these lines. Drugs that can home in on a certain location using a small robot that goes to the right location."

Shaham's research in medical robotics has already borne fruit in a device called SpineAssist, which is marketed by Mazor Surgical Technologies. "Robots are already performing surgeries on a daily basis – performing spine surgeries around the world," he says.

Using a controller, the researchers can move the little fly-like robotic creature at speeds of 0.35 millimetres a second by varying the magnetic field.

And because the control unit is external to the body, it can work for limitless periods of time, never needing a battery recharge during a procedure.

The researchers believe that with the addition of a camera, the latest tiny bot could be perfected for use in brachytherapy (short-distance radiation therapy), which is commonly used for treating head, neck and prostate cancer.

In parallel, robotics lab researchers at the Technion are also developing a tiny bot that swims, but not with arms, fins or flippers.

The research carried out by Dr. Gabor Kosa and Technion colleagues, uses a propulsion-based system that mimics an ancient biological structure called a flagella, which has long thread-like appendages that give cells the ability to move and swim. Flagella allows sperm to swim through vaginal fluid toward waiting eggs.

But at the Technion lab, they're thinking about fluid of another kind. One of the locations being targeted is cerebrospinal fluid, the fluid that the brain floats in and also surrounds the spinal system.

"We could use such a device for diagnosis or to feel around with electrodes, looking for cancer or other problems," Shaham said.

Yiskor
It is Tradition to make a charitable donation in memory of a loved one or friend.
As Yiskor is observed during High Holy Days, it is a time to remember.
Remembering your loved ones and to directly impact the lives of the children of Sderot and provide them with the chance to simply be kids, Jewish National Fund is embarking on a massive project; building the largest indoor, secure playground in Israel at Sderot.
We can't stop rocket attacks, but we can give these children an opportunity to escape the anxiety and fear they are forced to live with and to give the children something to smile about.
Please complete and return the Yiskor form enclosed in this issue.

We thank all those in the community who have given us nechama during this very difficult time of mourning over our father and husband, Rabbi Joseph Kelman z"l. Your visits, calls, notes and contributions in his memory are greatly appreciated and serve as a fitting tribute to someone who gave so much of himself during his fifty years of service to his shul, his community and all of us in the Toronto community and beyond.

May Rabbi Kelman's memory continue to be a source of blessings and inspiration to us all.

We pray that we be inscribed in the book of life, health, fulfillment and peace.

Minestrone soup ideal for Sukkot

By EILEEN GOLTZ
Special to The CJN

While chicken soup and matzah balls may be the quintessential soup of the High Holidays, minestrone is the one I always serve during Sukkot. An Italian soup made with fresh seasonal vegetables, often with the addition of pasta or rice, makes a perfect addition to any meal eaten outdoors.

The most common ingredients of minestrone soup include beans (dry and/or canned), onions, celery, carrots, stock and tomatoes. There is no single correct recipe for minestrone, since it is usually made out of whatever vegetables are in season or in your fridge. It can be whipped together (and thrown into a crockpot) relatively quickly before you head out for services to be ready when you get home, or cooked the night before and reheated. It can also be dairy, pareve or contain meat.

MINESTRONE OF MODENA

1 2 cup dried cannellini beans
1 3 to 1/2 cup olive oil
3 oz. sliced pastrami, chopped
1 cup minced yellow onions
1/2 cup minced celery
1/2 cup minced carrots
1 generous tbsp. chopped flat-leaf parsley
1 (14.5-oz.) can tomatoes, drained
2 medium potatoes, peeled and diced
4 oz. green beans, cut into 1/2-in. pieces
2 medium zucchini, diced
4 oz. white mushrooms, diced
2 cups shredded Savoy cabbage
4 oz. asparagus, diced
1 cup fresh or frozen petite green peas
8 to 10 basil leaves, shredded
8 cups warm water or canned low-sodium chicken broth salt and freshly ground black pepper

Sort beans, pick out the bad ones and soak overnight in water to cover.

Heat oil in large pot over medium heat. Add pastrami, onions, celery, carrots and parsley; cook, stirring until vegetables are lightly golden and soft, 8 to 10 minutes. Add tomatoes and stir, about 5 minutes. Drain and add the rehydrated cannellini beans, potatoes, green beans, zucchini, mushrooms, cabbage, asparagus, peas and basil to the pot.

Season with salt and pepper and stir for 2 to 3 minutes to coat vegetables well with savoury base. Add warm water and bring to a boil. Reduce heat to low, partially cover and simmer, stirring from time to time, for 2 to 2-1/2 hours, until the minestrone has a dense, thick consistency. (If the soup should thicken too much, add a bit more water.) Adjust seasoning.

Turn off heat and let soup stand for about 30 minutes. Serves 8 to 10.

Note: Rice or small pasta such as ditalini can be added to the soup during the last minutes of cooking. Add rice 10 minutes before you turn off the heat, pasta 3 to 5 minutes before. The rice or pasta will keep cooking as the soup rests.

Adapted from Biba's Taste of Italy by Biba Caggiano, William Morrow Publishing, 2001.

FAST AND EASY MINESTRONE

1 (10-oz.) package frozen spinach, thawed
1 1/2 lb. lean ground beef
1/3 cup dry breadcrumbs
1 egg
salt
1/4 tsp. pepper
2 tbsp. vegetable oil
1 large onion, coarsely chopped
7 cups beef or chicken or vegetable broth
1 (14.5-oz.) can whole tomatoes, mashed with a spoon
1 (15.5-oz.) can kidney beans
1/2 tsp. dried oregano
1/2 tsp. crumbled dried basil leaves
1 cup sliced carrots
1 cup sliced celery
1 cup uncooked rotelli pasta

Squeeze as much moisture as possible from spinach. Mix together with beef, breadcrumbs, egg, salt and pepper. Shape into 1-inch balls. Heat oil in Dutch oven over medium heat until very hot. Add a few meatballs and brown on all sides. Remove with slotted spoon and set aside to drain on paper towels. Repeat till all are browned.

Remove excess oil and add onion to Dutch oven; cook until opaque. Stir in broth, tomatoes, beans, oregano and basil. Cover and simmer for 10 minutes. Add carrots and celery; cover and simmer for 10 minutes more. Stir in pasta; cover and simmer until done, about 10 minutes. Add meatballs and heat through, about 5 minutes. Ladle into soup bowls. Serves 10 to 12.

VEGETARIAN MINESTRONE

2 tbsp. olive oil
1/2 large onion, diced
1/2 large sweet potato, diced
2 medium white potatoes, diced
3 stalks celery
1/2 cup frozen peas
2 carrots, chopped
1 cup frozen corn
15 oz. canned whole tomatoes
6 cups water, boiling
salt and pepper
fresh or dried oregano, to taste
1/4 lb. rotini pasta, cooked and drained
Parmesan cheese, optional for dairy

Sauté the onion in the olive oil, until golden. Add the sweet potato, white potatoes, celery, peas, carrots and corn and sauté until softened. Add tomatoes, breaking up with hands or spoon. Add boiling water, salt and pepper and simmer for 15 to 20 minutes. In the last minutes of cooking, add the cooked pasta to the soup. Ladle into bowls, garnish with cheese and oregano if desired. Serves 6.

Renowned violinist 'gives back' by teaching at York University

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Jacques Israelievitch

Jacques Israelievitch, the world-renowned violinist and concertmaster, cares more about inspiring others than about the fame and awards he's received throughout his 50-year career.

"Passing over knowledge of playing and appreciating music to others is the key to the future of the art," Israelievitch said the week before he launched York University's 2009-2010 Faculty Concert Series on Sept. 22.

If he wasn't involved in the development of young artists, his work would be much less meaningful, he said. During his performance on Tuesday, he aimed to connect with his students at York, as well as entertaining the audience.

"I am a performer because it gives me great pleasure, but the final aim is to reach out to the people, make a connection and transport them to a different place where they feel elevated and motivated by listening to music."

Israelievitch is a well-rounded player who is known for his performances of contemporary music. But the Cannes-born violinist, who made his debut with the French National Radio at age 11, doesn't let his accomplishments get in the way of his goal of building young, independent leaders through the arts.

"The aim of any performer is to create dialogue with the audience. The purpose of the dialogue is to make a lasting connection with them… to take motivation from listening to me… hopefully they'll work hard in their pursuits knowing that success can be reached."

Israelievitch said it was easy for him to add teaching to his busy performance schedule as he believes it's selfish for anyone with a talent to use it solely for his own benefit.

"The transition into teaching is a natural progression for anyone. First, I needed to focus on myself to be the best I could, but with that experience, I can now give back to others by teaching. Instead of just inspiring them by hearing my music, I can help them better their own playing and composing abilities," he said.

"Once one develops a desire to teach, it becomes his mission to do so."

Appointed assistant concertmaster of the Chicago Symphony Orchestra at just 23 by George Solti, Israelievitch said that as a concertmaster, he has arguably been teaching for years as part of some of North America's most-acclaimed orchestras, including a 20-year tenure with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra.

Though Israelievitch's career has been highlighted by awards and recognition as a soloist, he enjoys working with other musicians. His fondest moments have come playing alongside musical greats such as the pianists Yefim Bronfman and Emanuel Ax, he said. His favourite, his duet with cellist Yo-Yo Ma, isn't surprising, because for Israelievitch, it's not about what he can do on his own, but rather what he can do for and with others.

An instructor in York's department of music since the fall of 2008, Israelievitch is well aware of the anti-Semitism on campus and has his own way of dealing with it.

"The way I want to have an impact is through musical discussions," he said.

"Music is a universal language. I teach people of all backgrounds, and I see how they get along. With music, people express themselves in a non-violent, non-confrontational way, so communication is easier and more effective."

He stressed the importance of free speech on campus, but not when it purposefully insults others.

"In a learning environment, you should focus on your studies and try to better the world. Yes, both in professional and social activities, but never through conflict and violence," he said.

"I am privileged to work with students, to hopefully inspire them to be good people and not to insult others."

With that in mind, Israelievitch ensures that each of his classes and performances includes works that are not well-known. He said it shows students that no one person or group is more important than another, even if he – or it – is bigger and more popular.

But Israelievitch didn't want to discuss the situation at York. He prefers to keep to himself, and not attract attention to his beliefs, he said.

To change the subject, he said he'd much rather discuss toupees.

"Random, I know. But this one time I was performing and the conductor was wearing a toupee. He knocked it off with his baton and he tried conducting while fixing his toupee, his hands flailing in the air. The whole orchestra stopped and laughed," he recalled.

Chuckling over the memory, Israelievitch quickly noted in a stern voice that nothing similarly embarrassing has happened to him.

Israelievitch has three musician sons. Michael and Josh are following in his footsteps, playing classical music, however, David works in the hip-hop genre.

Israelievitch doesn't care for hip hop but said he's content knowing David has found his own path and has an appreciation for music.

Michael, 26, Israelievitch's middle son, is a percussionist. Michael and his father frequently perform as the Israelievitch Duo.

"Music is meant to be enjoyed by everyone," Israelievitch said. "The more who play, the more there is to go around."

Netanyahu, Obama, Abbas meet in New York

By Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu was to defend the expansion of West Bank settlements, during his planned meeting with U.S. President Barack Obama and Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas Tuesday, Netanyahu's spokesperson said Monday.

"You have never heard the prime minister say he would freeze settlement building. The opposite is true," Nir Hefetz told Army Radio when asked about the tripartite summit, which was to take place on the sidelines of the United Nations General Assembly in New York.

The meeting was seen in Israel as a success for Netanyahu, who has refused to agree to a demand from the United States and the Palestinians for a total halt to West Bank settlement construction. The Palestinians say the meeting will not constitute negotiations, since Abbas has refused to hold peace talks with Netanyahu until Israel freezes settlement construction.

The tripartite meeting was to take place Tuesday at 11 a.m. at the Waldorf Astoria Hotel in Manhattan. Prior to the joint meeting between the three leaders, Obama was scheduled to meet with Abbas and Netanyahu separately. The U.S. president was to make a last-ditch effort to pressure the two to move toward a compromise agreement that could lead to an announcement of the resumption of peace talks.

A source in the Prime Minister's Office said it has been agreed with the U.S. administration that the meeting will not include any negotiations, but the leaders will review developments in the situation. Moreover, the Israeli sources said it was agreed that there would be no preconditions to the meeting, which the source insisted is an Israeli "victory."

Netanyahu was also scheduled to meet with French President Nicolas Sarkozy and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, and he is to address the General Assembly on Thursday afternoon. In his speech, he will focus on the need for international action to stop Iran's nuclear program. Netanyahu has described his address as "dramatic."

Benjamin Netanyahu

Barack Obama

Mahmoud Abbas

Meanwhile, Defence Minister Ehud Barak said in comments published Monday that the Palestinians are likely to miss a chance for statehood because of their intransigence.

"I fear the Palestinians are going to miss a huge opportunity," the New York Times quoted Barak as saying, in an article published the day before the meeting in New York.

"There is a president who says determinedly, 'I am going to put my political capital into making sure there is an independent Palestinian state and solve all the core issues in two years.' If we bear in mind Israel's security needs and the demand that a final agreement means an end to the conflict, this is an opportunity that must not be missed," Barak was further quoted as telling the paper.

Sources in the Prime Minister's Office as well as in the Obama administration have stressed that the summit is unlikely to result in a resumption of peace negotiations between the Israelis and the Palestinians because of differences over settlement construction and the framework of the peace process.

Late Sunday, Barak left for Washington, where he was to meet with U.S. Secretary of Defence Robert Gates and national security adviser Gen. James Jones.

Barak, who is also a deputy prime minister, said in the interview that he would focus in Washington on maintaining Israel's qualitative military edge, on Iran and on the Palestinians, the New York Times said.

The minister also reportedly said that concern about Iran remains a top priority and that Israel wants the diplomatic efforts being pursued by the Americans to be limited, well defined and followed by tough sanctions. He reiterated that he removes no option from the table, a reference to the possibility of a military assault on Iranian nuclear facilities, the paper said.

Barak added that a central challenge for the United States now is how to handle the nuclear weapons of North Korea, the paper reported, because that would greatly influence Iran.

"North Korea is developing long-range missiles in the backyard of China and Russia and nothing happens to them," he was quoted as saying. "When the Iranian leadership asks themselves, 'Should we be worried or just go through the ritual of defying and cheating?' the answer depends on what happens to North Korea. A coherent move toward blocking nuclear proliferation should start with North Korea. It would have very positive ramifications for blocking Iran."

'Report is biased, extremely radical, and has no basis in reality'

Goldstone received the UN Human Rights Council's permission to broaden his mandate to consider Hamas actions. The 575-page report accused Palestinian militants of committing war crimes by firing rockets on civilians populations. And it called on Israel to conduct independent investigations of what it calls war crimes and crimes against humanity.

Among the other allegations in the report are that Israel created an "emergency situation" in Gaza through its blockade prior to, during and after the war, and that its use of white phosphorus, a chemical irritant used as an obscurant during the war, was excessive. It also dismisses Israel's claim that almost all the 240 policemen killed during the war were combatants, and it chronicles about a dozen allegations of Israel shooting unarmed Palestinians.

Foreign Minister Avigdor Lieberman called the Goldstone Commission's conclusion that Israel committed war crimes in the Gaza Strip "pre-determined."

"The Goldstone Commission was formed to find Israel [guilty] of war crimes determined in advance," said Lieberman.

"The Goldstone report is seeking to bring the UN back to the dark days in which it decided, under the guidance of states with interests, that Zionism is racism," Lieberman added in a statement.

The report, he continued, "has no legal, factual or ethical validity whatsoever."

"The State of Israel will continue to defend its citizens from the attacks of terrorists and terrorist organizations, and will continue to defend its soldiers against attacks of hypocrisy and distortion," he added.

Military Advocate General Brig.-Gen. Avichai Mendelblit denounced the report as "biased" and said it blatantly overstepped the commission's mandate.

The Goldstone report is "biased, extremely radical, and has no basis in reality," Mendelblit said.

Israel has meanwhile asked a number of senior members of the Obama administration to assist in curbing the international fallout from the Goldstone Commission report.

The Foreign Ministry decided last week to focus its efforts to combat the report's accusations on the United States, Russia and a few other members of the UN Security Council and Human Rights Council that are involved in the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The Israeli message is that the Goldstone report threatens those countries, because it makes the war on terror very difficult and, therefore, efforts must be made to prevent it from being brought before the International Criminal Court in The Hague.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu raised the issue with U.S. special Middle East envoy George Mitchell, while Deputy Foreign Minister Daniel Ayalon discussed it with the U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, Susan Rice, and other senior officials.

In Canada, meanwhile, Peter Kent, minister of state of foreign affairs (Americas), told the House of Commons that "the so-called fact-finding commission was the creation of one of the United Nation's most flawed bodies, the Human Rights Council, which includes some of the UN's least democratic states.

"In commissioning this study, the Human Rights Council pre-emptively assumed Israel's culpability. This government has never equated Israel, a democratic state, with terrorist groups which seek to destroy both it and its people."

Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) CEO Shimon Fogel said the Goldstone report will likely have little impact among decision-makers in Ottawa. "Canada, the European Union and many others rejected participation and dismissed it before the group was convened by Goldstone," he said. "They refused to endorse the mandate, let alone the findings."

The UN Human Rights Council, which commissioned the report, declared prior to the investigation that "Israel caused massive violations of human rights. The conclusions they came out with cannot be credible. It's like at a trial where a jury in advance asserted that the defendant is guilty," Fogel said.

(The resolution that set out the mandate of the Goldstone commission states that the council decided "to dispatch an urgent, independent international fact-finding mission… to investigate all violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law by the occupying power, Israel, against the Palestinian people throughout the occupied Palestinian territory, particularly in the occupied Gaza Strip, due to the current aggression, and calls upon Israel not to obstruct the process of investigation and to fully co-operate with the mission.")

Fogel said that the Goldstone commission "assessed Israeli actions in isolation, without the context of the conflict, without inquiring into the conduct of Hamas, not just regarding rocket attacks, but with regard to civilians absconding with international relief supplies, hijacking hospitals and clinics to attend to their own, using international infrastructure to shield fighters and assault Israelis."

Fogel also suggested that the more critical aspects of the report will be found to be as untrue as were earlier allegations against Israel, including allegations about the so-called "Jenin massacre," which "never happened. This report is no different than others that came out beforehand."

The report "further discredits the UN Human Rights Council, which was reconfigured to salvage a shred of credibility from its previous iteration [the UN Commission on Human Rights]."

Fogel said that members of the political class in Ottawa "for the most part understand it was biased, skewed. You may find a few quarters in the margins of the political sector, even MPs, who will use it to affirm Israel as a rogue state. But it's a marginal fringe."

As to public opinion, Fogel said, "I'm not sure the Goldstone report received much traction in Canada."

In a column in the Jerusalem Post, Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler said that the mandate establishing the Goldstone Commission was "tainted," "flawed" and "one-sided." Cotler noted that one member of the commission – London School of Economics professor Christine Chinkin – "had already pronounced herself on the merits of the issues, thereby giving rise to a reasonable apprehension of bias in the work of the commission."

Furthermore, the UN Human Rights Council, which established the commission, "has systematically singled out one member state in the international community… while the major human rights violators have enjoyed exculpatory immunity."

B'nai Brith Canada condemned the Goldstone report "for its lack of objectivity."

"This was not a truth-seeking inquiry in any way. The UN bodies that gave Goldstone and his team their mandate had a pre-set conclusion in mind: Israel, as a collective entity, is a war criminal. Goldstone and his team, in the context of the UN's notorious campaign against Israel, went on a mission to prove this disgraceful hypothesis and, in the process, attempt to demonize and delegitimize the Jewish state," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith's executive vice-president.

Italy to investigate resurgent anti-Semitism

CJC submits brief to parliamentary committee studying issue

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Momentum seems to be building in European capitals to investigate and address the resurgence of anti-Semitism.

Italy's Chamber of Deputies announced recently it would launch an inquiry into anti-Semitism, with the chambers' president describing the phenomenon as a "vile hatred" that has to be eradicated. Meanwhile, in Germany a panel of distinguished experts has been convened to look at anti-Semitism in that country, including a growing trend that has seen expressions of resentment among some Germans for being continually blamed for the Holocaust.

Irwin Cotler

Globetrotting MP Irwin Cotler recently returned from Italy, where he attended a meeting of the steering committee of the International Parliamentary Coalition for Combating Anti-Semitism (ICCA).

The committee was established prior to a gathering of 125 international parliamentarians from 40 countries in London last February. Delegates discussed "the resurgence of anti-Semitism as a potent force in politics, international affairs and society" and adopted the London Declaration on Combating Antisemitism, which calls on parliamentarians and governments to take steps to oppose the phenomenon.

Cotler, who co-chaired the organization's founding conference, will serve as the steering committee's international chair for the next two years.

He noted the strong condemnation of anti-Semitism by Gianfranco Fini, president of the Italian Chamber of Deputies, who called it "'vile and evil like an octopus with its tentacles everywhere, that has to be combated root and branch.'"

The London Declaration serves as the template for parliaments and the public to define and recognize anti-Semitism, including its emergence as "hatred of Israel, the Jewish people's collectivity… The new anti-Semitism is the discrimination of and denial and assault upon the right of the Jewish people to live as part of the family of nations," Cotler said.

The London Declaration also proposes remedies that could be adopted to confront it, he said.

"Canada is a case study of what can be done," he continued. It has established an all-party parliamentary coalition to fight anti-Semitism, headed by Tory MP Scott Reid. It has set up the first-ever parliamentary inquiry into the phenomenon, chaired by MP Mario Silva and is holding hearings this fall.

Canada will also host the next meeting of the inter-parliamentary group in the autumn of 2010 and is disseminating the London Declaration to government officials, NGOs and civil society.

Meanwhile, in a written submission to the Parliamentary Inquiry into Antisemitism in Canada, established as a result of the London Declaration, Canadian Jewish Congress called on political leaders to "stress the need for civil discourse, based on Canadian values, among groups in Canada, especially when dealing with contentious political issues."

It urged government to withhold funding from groups that support or preach anti-Semitism, to challenge expressions of anti-Semitism and threats of genocide in international fora, and it called for employing "legal and administrative systems… to engage the fight against anti-Semitism" including reaffirming and strengthening the Criminal Code and human rights legislation.

Israel Briefs

Jerusalem Day in Tehran

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad said the Holocaust was a "lie" and that Israel's days were numbered. The Iranian president was addressing a rally in Tehran to mark Jerusalem Day, when the Iranian regime expresses solidarity with the Palestinians. "The pretext for establishing the Zionist regime is a lie," he said, "a lie which relies on an unreliable claim, a mythical claim, and the occupation of Palestine." Referring to western leaders, he said: "They launched the myth of the Holocaust. They lied, they put on a show, and then they support the Jews." Israel's days are "numbered" and its regime is "dying," he added. Ahmadinejad's speech comes days before he travels to New York to address the United Nations General Assembly, and two weeks before Iran launches its dialogue with the West under an Obama administration initiative.

Roadblocks dismantled

The army began dismantling 100 roadblocks in the West Bank. The dirt-mound obstacles that block the entrances to villages in the West Bank were set up during the second intifadah to make it impossible for Palestinians to travel directly from village to village. They are found as well on some main roads in the West Bank used by both Palestinians and Israelis. Defence Minister Ehud Barak ordered the roadblocks' removal to improve the quality of life for Palestinians in the West Bank.

A matriarch of note

A 99-year-old woman who died last week left behind at least 1,400 descendants, an Israeli newspaper reported. Rachel Krishevsky, who died Sept. 12, had 11 children, who in turn had 150 children, Ynet reported. Krishevsky's children, grandchildren, great-grandchildren and great-great-grandchildren number about 1,400, the newspaper said. Krishevsky lived most of her life next to Jerusalem's Mahane Yehuda market. A grandchild told the newspaper that she "knew all her descendants."

Terror suspect

Security forces arrested a Hamas leader who Israel says was involved in a Passover eve suicide bombing in Netanya. Mohammed Mastafa Mahmoud Harouish, 26, was arrested near Bethlehem along with one of his senior aides, an Israeli army spokesperson said. Harouish is the head of the Hamas military wing in Tulkarem. He has been wanted since 2004 for his involvement in Hamas terrorist activity, which was a foundation for the suicide bombing in Netanya in 2002 that killed 30 people. He has been involved in another thwarted suicide attack, and also recruited militants, formed terror cells and purchased weaponry, according to the IDF.

23rd swine flu victim

A 33-year-old pregnant mother of 10 became Israel's 23rd death related to swine flu. The woman, who was 39 weeks pregnant, died last Sunday during an operation to remove her fetus, which had died in utero. Two days earlier, the 22nd Israeli death related to swine flu was a 49-year-old man who had serious medical problems.

Ex-CHAT shaliach arrested in Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A former teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto was arrested in Israel for alleged sexual abuse of a 14-year-old male student at a religious boys' high school.

The Hebrew edition of Ha'aretz reported on Sept. 14 that Avichai Zehavi – a 41-year-old, married father of four whose wife is pregnant – was accused of sodomizing the youngster. Zehavi denied the charges, the article said.

A subsequent report that appeared last Friday on ynet.co.il, also in Hebrew, added that two other boys had come forward and accused Zehavi of further sexual offences. As well, according to ynet, the alleged offences occurred both at the school during school hours and off the premises when a student was invited by Zehavi to a relative's house on Shabbat.

In Toronto, Zehavi taught Tanach and rabbinics, and served as director of student programs and activities when he was a shaliach at TanenbaumCHAT's Richmond Hill campus from 2000 to 2005. In 2002, he received a Teacher of Excellence award, a privately sponsored award that is no longer given.

He then spent about 10 months as cantor at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he worked with teens and children, before returning to Israel. Among other duties, he led youth programming and ran the synagogue's bar mitzvah program.

Last Friday, Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, e-mailed a statement regarding the situation to current school parents, staff and board members, and to all students who attended the school while Zehavi was on staff and whose addresses the school has.

Until the school learned of the allegations, "we had no cause to doubt the integrity of this individual," Shaviv wrote. "The school takes any such allegation very seriously." The safety and security of our students is our first priority (italics are Shaviv's).

However, he told The CJN, recently the school received "information of concern, from official channels."

He asked that any parents or former students "with information or concerns about any relevant incidents" contact him directly either by e-mail at pshaviv@tanenbaumchat.org, or by phone on his direct line at 905-292-4380.

Shaviv's statement didn't name Zehavi, following legal advice the school was given, he said. "He is not accused of anything in this country.

"We are deeply concerned about this, and deeply concerned to ensure that we act in a responsible manner," Shaviv told The CJN. "We do want to stress that at this point there were only allegations regarding incidents that may have happened in Toronto."

Shaviv added that the school has been in contact with other local institutions that Zehavi was connected with.

Shaarei Shomayim president Charlene Arje told The CJN that the news about the allegations "was a complete shock." The shul also sent out an e-mail to members last week about the case. Arje said that "there are no allegations or knowledge of misconduct here, but we take it very, very seriously."

And now for something completely different: HEEBONICS

Zebrina's all-star musicians play a world of tunes

By EZRA GLINTER
Special to The CJN

Going by the roster of musicians that make up Zebrina, the six-piece Toronto bands looks to be an all-star klezmer outfit.

With members from Klezfactor, Beyond the Pale, and the Flying Bulgars (formerly the Flying Bulgar Klezmer Band), it would be no surprise if Zebrina's repertoire consisted of the usual bulgars and doinas, albeit top-notch versions.

But klezmer is only one of the items in composer, pianist and bandleader Jonathan Feldman's bag of tricks. Taking in jazz, reggae, Latin music and an array of other influences, Zebrina aims to meld "eastern melodies" with "western grooves."

"Our music is a mosaic of western music styles flavoured by eastern-sounding melodies. There is a lot of jazz-sounding stuff, as well as pieces that have rock beats, Latin beats, a reggae piece – I've tried to experiment with lots of different styles, and see if I can make something Jewish out of them," Feldman said.

With members from Klezfactor, Beyond the Pale and the Flying Bulgars, Zebrina knows how to infuse "eastern melodies" with "western grooves." [Asli Alin photos]

Jonathan Feldman, Zebrina's composer, pianist and bandleader, likes to experiment with different styles.

Feldman, 35, grew up in a Conservative Jewish household in Hamilton, Ont., where he attended Hamilton Hebrew Academy. Later, he studied computer science at McGill University and at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology, as well as education at the University of Western Ontario and jazz piano at the University of Toronto.

Currently, in addition to his work with Zebrina, Feldman plays private engagements and in a jazz duo with bassist Bret Higgins, who also plays with Zebrina and Beyond the Pale.

While Feldman finds an outlet for his musical creativity on Toronto stages and bandstands, he complements the artistic side of his personality with his background in computer science and mathematics, which he teaches part time at TAIE Institute, helping to prepare international students for admission to Canadian universities.

The relationship between his weekend jams and weekday calculations might not always be apparent, but the two sides of his life are connected, Feldman said.

"I think the kinds of things we use to solve problems in math and in music are very similar. When you're improvising in music, you're trying to react in the moment, and you can think of that as trying to solve problems really quickly, which is the same kind of thing you're trying to do when you're solving problems in math."

It wasn't until after he had completed his master's degree at MIT, however, while he was playing with a seven-piece jazz-funk group called Megalodon in Boston, that Feldman discovered Jewish music.

His main inspiration was avant-garde saxophonist John Zorn, whose Masada compositions blend Jewish inspirations with a cutting-edge musical sensibility. In addition to his own work, Zorn also produces like-minded artists as part of the Radical Jewish Culture series on his Tzadik record label.

"Zorn started playing Jewish music that could be played by jazz musicians. This was the inception for many Jewish musicians to write music that was modern and post-modern, something radically different from traditional klezmer or Israeli folk music," Feldman said.

"I grew up Conservative and went to Zionist camps, so I was always surrounded by Jewish culture growing up. And as I learned that music and played those scales, there was something that resonated in me, it seemed like a natural part of what was already inside me. So in a way the music wrote itself. But I think the neat thing about this that is different, and what John Zorn does that is different, is that you can play music that isn't hokey, that can be taken seriously as art music."

Inspired by Zorn, Feldman wrote a piece for his Boston band that he called Wandering Jew. Later, when he learned that there was a plant of that name, called Tradescantia zebrina or Zebrina pendula in Latin, he decided to use the title for his new band.

When Feldman moved back to Canada to study music and teaching, he continued his exploration of klezmer and Jewish music, first as a saxophone player in a nine-piece Hamilton band called Touch of Klez, and later at the University of Toronto. It was there that he met Higgins and, with his encouragement, continued writing music in the style he had absorbed from Zorn, producing the pieces that would eventually become the material for Zebrina.

"At U of T, I had written some music that would fit into that mould, and we started talking about putting together a band," Feldman said.

"Originally, I wanted to form a band to play Zorn's Masada music, but Bret said that we should write our own music."

In the fall of 2008, Feldman put the band together and they began playing in Toronto at the Free Times Café, Trane Studio, Tranzac, and Gate 403. This fall, the band heads into the studio to record its first album, thanks to a recording grant from the Ontario Arts Council.

Though Feldman is responsible for writing and arranging Zebrina's material, the band's unique sound is largely due to its eclectic assortment of instruments. Drummer Colin Kingsmore and percussionist Max Sennit lay down rhythms that draw on a range of sources and styles, while Joel Schwartz's guitar and Feldman's electric keyboard provide a distinctly rock 'n' roll feel. On top of that, Mike Anklewicz's clarinet contributes the characteristic wails, trills and ornamentation of classic klezmer.

When he gets into the studio, Feldman said, one of his priorities is to record pieces that use his bandmates' skills to maximum benefit.

"I'm really blessed to have some of the best musicians around, and since they're such great sololsts and have their own voices, one goal is to pick the pieces that are going to showcase their talents," he said.

Zebrina isn't all klezmer, but it may be an all-star band after all.

Lebanon is a cinematic achievement

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The 34th edition of the Toronto International Film Festival was a bonanza for Israeli films. Never in its history had films from the Jewish state been so highlighted. Ten of them, showcased in the festival's inaugural City to City program, focused on Tel Aviv, which marks its centennial this year.

The strongest, most memorable movie was Lebanon, written and directed by Samuel Maoz. Amazingly enough, it's his first feature film. Lebanon won the top prize at this year's Venice Film Festival, the Golden Lion, and it is richly deserved.

The second Israeli film after Waltz with Bashir to be set during Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, it unfolds in the first hours of that divisive war as a tank, containing four weary soldiers, rumbles north to clear Palestinian gunmen from a hostile Lebanese village.

Much of the action takes place in the dim, filthy, claustrophobic confines of the tank, a roaring, clanking menacing machine that crashes through a banana plantation en route to fulfilling its mission. The soldiers – Assi the commander, Shmuel the gunner, Herzl the loader and Yigal the driver – feel the tension of the moment keenly. They're scared, confused and argumentative.

When armed Palestinians in a BMW sedan open fire, the gunner hesitates, with bloody results. Chastened by this incident, the tankists launch a shell at an oncoming truck, badly wounding an innocent Lebanese civilian transporting live chickens in cages.

Black smoke and dust rise from the village they enter. It has just been bombed by the air force. Corpses are strewn about and a frantic, partially dressed mother looks for her five-year-old child.

Assi is under instructions not to use white phosphorous shells and thus break international law, but he ignores the order.

A hostile rocket slams into the tank, and the screen goes black. Shortly after a captured and obviously frightened Syrian commando is lowered into the tank, a sinister looking member of the Phalange, the Christian militia allied with Israel, threatens to torture him to death.

Confusion, fear and panic reign when the soldiers are informed that they have strayed into Syrian lines. In revealing closeups, the camera pans on their grimy, sweaty faces. Facing the prospect of dying on the battlefield, one of the tankists pleads for his mother, while another soldier retreats into himself in a semi-catatonic state.

In bold, riveting, graphic brushstrokes, Moaz captures the visceral horror, boredom and uncertainty of warfare. Lebanon is a cinematic achievement of the first rank.

Bena, by Niv Klainer, is suffused with melancholy. Amos (Shmuel Vilonzi), a widower, lives alone with his schizophrenic son, Yurik (Michael Moshonov), whose behaviour fluctuates. One day, an illegal Thai alien, Bena (Rachel Santillan), enters their lives, changing the dynamics of their household.

Bena* is a film about an unusual relationship.

Amos treats Yurik with tender, loving care and humours him when the occasion calls for it, such as when Yurik decides to build an igloo in Antarctica. But once Bena, a serene and attractive woman, arrives, Yurik feels pangs of love, and Amos hires her as Yurik's live-in companion.

Since Yurik's behaviour is less than normal, he grows violent, and in one uncomfortable episode, he throws himself sexually on Bena. These incidents tax Amos' patience and prompt him to wonder whether he should institutionalize his unruly son.

Amos relates to Bena – a married woman whose husband works in a banana grove – as a proper gentleman, even after she provocatively asks him to cut her hair and share his bed. Within the context of the film, Bena's requests come out of nowhere and seem strange.

Despite these clunkers, Bena, a modest and unpretentious film, manages to leave a viewer with a fairly poignant picture of an unusual father-and-son relationship.

Danny Lerner's Kirot is a crime thriller set in Tel Aviv's dark underbelly.

In a raunchy club, two Russian prostitutes try to escape from their miserable existence as sex slaves. They are caught, thrown into a cell and beaten to within an inch of their lives.

Galia (Olga Kurylenko, the female lead in the last James Bond film), one of the ladies of the night, does not want to go back to the club to ply her trade. Mishka, her brutal pimp, makes her an offer she finds repugnant but can't refuse. Handing her a pistol, he orders her to kill a man whom the mafia wants to rub out.

In return, Galia will regain her freedom, the money she is owed and the chance to be reunited with her daughter back home in Kiev. Galia carries out her part of the pact, but the mafia reneges. By chance, Galia meets Elinor (Ninet Tayeb), a pregnant Israeli grocery store cashier whose spouse is physically abusing her. The pair find solace in each other's company, but there are still loose ends to be tied up.

Ten movies showcased at TIFF's Tel Aviv program

Impregnated with violence, brutality and gunplay, and filled with lowlifes, Kirot casts a lurid spotlight on the unsavoury flesh trade in Israel and seems to have been made for an international market. Unfolding mainly in Russian and English, with a few Hebrew phrases and words thrown in, it moves at a fast, scintillating pace, and the actors deliver chillingly credible performances.

Ajami, by Scandar Copti and Yaron Shani, derives its name from an Israeli Arab district in Jaffa. The film is about the drug trade, warring families, Arab blood feuds, an Israeli soldier who goes missing in the West Bank, and the driven detective who tries to find him.

Starring amateur Arab and Jewish actors who were whipped into shape by the directors, Ajami underscores the alienation between Jews and Arabs in Israel, notwithstanding the fact that one of the Arab characters has a Jewish girlfriend. In a conversation with a Jew, an Israeli Arab refers to Tel Aviv as "your Tel Aviv," while a Jew compares Jaffa to the Gaza Strip.

Amos Gitai, the festival's favourite Israeli director, is back again with Carmel, which is probably his most personal film in years. Ranging far and wide, Gitai tosses into the mix a Roman army conquering Jerusalem, an Israeli army encampment during the 2006 war in Lebanon, Jewish settlers cruelly cutting down Palestinian olive trees, and an Israeli couple donning gas masks during the 1991 Gulf War.

Between these sequences, Gitai recalls his boyhood, his brush with death in the Yom Kippur War and his mother's poetic nature.

On a more political plane, Gitai reflects on the "half-truths and half-lies" that Israel and Arab countries peddle to their citizens and observes that the reasons for starting a war are inevitably forgotten.

Anything but linear, Carmel, an art film par excellence, wanders off in all directions, like spinning free verse. Alas, the pieces don't always fit together in this all-too-self-indulgent, meandering film.

Phobidilia, directed by Yoav and Doron Paz, takes us into the spiritually suffocating apartment of a phobic young man who prefers virtual reality to the real thing. But as he turns to TV and the Internet for companionship and sex, he realizes that the "perfect world" he has carefully crafted is falling apart and that human relationships are the touchstones of life.

The film makes its point, but it's hard on the eyes and mind.

Raphael Nadjari's documentary, A History of Israeli Cinema, at least part one, is far too academic and dry for a conventional audience. Nadjari is no Ken Burns.

But he traces the development of the industry from 1932 to 1978, from the first commercial film (Oded the Wanderer) to the advent of popular "boureka" comedies in the 1960s.

Nadjari explains the significance of the Holocaust and Otto Preminger's Exodus on Israeli film, assesses the contributions of filmmakers such as Menahem Golan, Ephraim Golan and Uri Zohar, and analyzes the impact of the Six Day War on Israeli directors.

Carmel* is Amos Gitai's latest offering.

Beyond The Pale's multicultural sound reflects band's diversity

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Eric Stein offers no apologies for Beyond The Pale's boundary-breaking, genre-bending style of klezmer of music

After all, the group's leader and mandolin player reasons, by branching out they are staying true to the origins of klezmer

Klezmer, originally, was the instrumental folk music of eastern European Jews of the shtetl but was always borrowing from their surroundings – be it Hungarian, Polish, Gypsy or others

"The klezmorim of yesterday would understand us," Stein says. "During their time, they were always blending Russian, Romanian or Turkish influences into their songs."

Beyond the Pale is celebrating the release of their third album, Postcards, with a release party at the Lula Lounge in Toronto on Oct.1.

Like their first two CDs, Routes and Consensus, Postcards uses klezmer as a starting point and fleshes out from there into dance rhythms, funky grooves and intricate instrumentals. The 16 songs are a mixture of original songs and progressive arrangements of traditional ones.

"This is our most adventurous, wide-ranging and eclectic work," Stein says. "Our arrangements are very dynamic. On some songs you can hear a pin drop, followed by an explosion of energy."

Stein, who is the artistic director of Toronto's Ashkenaz Festival, the largest Jewish cultural event in Canada, is a bit uncomfortable with the "klezmer" label. "I know enough about klezmer to know we're not 100 per cent klezmer. We are more diverse and multicultural. We are east European fusion with strong Jewish/klezmer influences."

Stein likens their sound to a good gourmet meal. "A chef knows what ingredients to put into a good stew. We try to be music connoisseurs in the way we mix all our influences together."

Stein is in fact the only Jewish member of a six-piece band that also features Bogdan Djukic (percussion, violin), Bret Higgins (double bass), Aleksandar Gajic (violin, viola), Milos Popovic (accordion) and Martin van de Ven (clarinet). Stein said the band's sound reflects the diversity of the band – half of which is Serbian. Because of that, you can hear a strong Balkan influence, especially on songs like Katarina and Extra Spicy

"Our PR guy in the States calls our music 'Jewish Balkan twang!' That's as close as you can get to a one-liner description of us."

Songs like Meditation and the van de Ven-penned Dutchmander showcase more traditional klezmer sounds

The album's multicultural sound is depicted visually on the cover, which features old postcards and photographs of the band members' ancestors from Russia, Serbia and Romania. In the background, barely visible, is light Yiddish text.

Only three of the songs on Postcards contain vocals, and they are sung in Yiddish by Israeli-based Vira Lozinsky singing lyrics written by her father Michael Felsenbaum, a Yiddish poet, over traditional Gypsy melodies.

"Vira is one of the few practitioners of Yiddish song in Israel, where Yiddish is not so popular," Stein says. He discovered her when she sent a demo CD in to the Ashkenaz Festival.

"She's originally from Beltz in Moldova (from where the Yiddish song Beltz, Mayn Shtetele originates from). I was blown away by her voice, so I brought her in for Ashkenaz." When she was in Toronto, they recorded the three songs she sings on Postcards.

The group is looking forward to heading out on the road early next year in Europe and California, but nothing can probably beat playing at Carnegie Hall earlier this year.

"We played at Carnegie Hall for Theodore Bikel's 85th birthday. It was by invitation only, and it was quite an honour for us."

They played on a bill that included Arlo Guthrie, Peter, Paul and Mary and the Klezmatics. They were introduced by actor Alan Alda.

"It was a real thrill," Stein says. "The most exciting thing we've done in the last little while."

You can catch Beyond The Pale's exciting and dynamic live sound at Lula Lounge, 1585 Dundas St. W., on Oct.1, at 8:30 p.m. Tickets are $15 in advance or $20 at the door. Call 416-588-0307 or visit www.lulalounge.ca For more information about Beyond The Pale, visit www.beyondthepale.net

A survivor's dying daughter publishes his memoirs

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It is tragically ironic that actress and writer Naava Piatka released her self-published book about her father, a Holocaust survivor, just weeks before she died. She was 57.

It's ironic, because for the past few months Piatka, who suffered from terminal cancer, had been using her last days to say goodbye to family and friends while she worked with editors to release No Goodbyes. The book is available on Amazon.ca.

Speaking to The CJN from her home in New Jersey, shortly before passing away on Sept. 17, she said releasing the book, which she had started to work on nearly two decades ago, was a fulfilling experience.

No Goodbyes is a father-daughter memoir based on the stories her late father, Xavier Piat, shared about the war, survival, his wife and his family.

The book offers stories about his childhood in Vilna, Lithuania, including "his divorced mother in Paris; his return to war-torn, Nazi-invaded Poland; his forced first marriage; the hiding of future Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin in their family basement; his controversial role in the Vilna Ghetto administration; his wartime hard labour camp trials and triumphs; his surprising rescue by a Nazi; his emotional encounters with his father in Stutthof concentration camp; his agonizing snowbound death march; his eventual liberation…" and more.

Piatka, who was born in Cape Town, South Africa, and immigrated to the United States in 1977, began collecting her father's stories in the mid-1980s, with the intention of turning it into a book. The project, however, was put on the back burner until last year.

"It began when I started talking to my father about his past," Piatka said, adding that she never had that opportunity to do the same with her mother.

"My mother died [in 1979] just before the birth of my first child. I was seven months pregnant with her when I got the news that she had passed, and I did not know that she was sick, or was dying. She kept it a secret."

She said in the years that followed, her father would visit her each summer.

"One day I realized that he is the last of this vanishing breed [of Holocaust survivors]. I don't know what their experiences were at all because they never told me. I knew that they were Holocaust survivors, but the details, I did not know," Piatka said.

"I really felt a sense of urgency. He was not getting younger and I had some time, and I was interested… We sat by my pool, and stories just poured out, basically.

"There came the part where he met my mother and told me about her life. I was astounded to find out that she was this famous actress who entertained so many people and was so beloved."

Naava Piatka performing Better Don't Talk.

Piatka, herself an actress, artist and writer, learned that her mother, Chayela Rosenthal, was a celebrated star of the Vilna Ghetto theatre.

"One night, my mother appeared to me in a dream to say, 'Why are you writing a book about your father? I was the star! You should write about me and make it a musical,'" Piatka said.

"I became beset by visions and my imagination went overboard. I started to hear songs, I started imagining her in the ghetto, in a place I've never been."

She said that until she sat down with her father to record his testimony, all she knew about her parents' past was what she gathered from "one-liners" her mother used to say.

"Things like when she said, 'There was a selection and my mother pushed me to the right.' I don't have a context of where it happened or whether it was when the ghetto was liquidated, but all of these one-liners stayed with me," Piatka said.

"My mother had a photograph of her brother under the glass of the dressing table, and I remember asking her once about it and she said, 'He was a poet, he was a writer and they killed him one day before liberation.'"

She said it was out of these tidbits of information that she began to flesh out scenes for a musical based on her mother's experience in the Vilna Ghetto called Better Don't Talk – A Daughter Uncovers Her Mother's Hidden Past.

"Out of writing the musical I began doing research and I got in touch with people, people from the Holocaust museum, and people got in touch with me… and more and more things came out," Piatka said.

She said her father gave her a book that contained lyrics and music written by her uncle, Leyb Rozental.

After completing her research and writing the play, it was time for Piatka to perform.

"When I stepped into the role of playing my mother… it was… as if my mother had flown in for the performance. It was as if she inhabited me and people said I was transformed," she recalled.

"It took a while for me to get beyond crying when I would perform it because, you know, I missed her… Writing the play was not only cathartic and meaningful, but it was a way of me becoming much closer to my mother."

She said she performed in cities all over the world, but the highlight was performing in Vilna, on the same stage her mother had once performed.

"It was for the 60th anniversary of the liquidation of the Vilna Ghetto. That was extraordinarily meaningful, just to be part of all those events that happened, the honorary ceremonies that happened."

This was the first time that I had been to Vilna and here I was, performing and treated like absolute royalty, like a VIP because I was my mother's daughter."

She said that after that performance, a group of survivors approached her and asked her to sing the song her uncle had written for the Vilna theatre.

"They wanted to hear the song, I Miss My Home. It's a very poignant song that he wrote about missing Vilna… I got this moment of nervousness, when I thought, 'Can I pull this off?'… I thought, 'Let me just have my mother's strength and my uncle's convictions and let me just sing it without crying,'" she said.

"I did sing it… and it was so moving. They were really hushed and they were crying afterwards. It was as if I had brought my mother back for a moment."

Since Piatka was diagnosed with cervical cancer in October 2008, she stopped performing, but a DVD of the play has been released. She had been working with a contact in Toronto to have it screened in Toronto-area synagogues and day schools.

But even before Piatka learned of her terminal illness, she turned her attention back to the book and felt an urgency to complete and release it.

"I've been working on it for the past year, refining it, working with an editor."

She said that her father was the historian of the family and was eager to tell his story even at a time when most survivors were silent.

"His motto was forgive, but don't forget. He was very inspiring," she said.

"I've made these stories from my point of view, the second-generation point of view… Because one can get a story from a survivor, but what is often left out is the impact of what happened to the generations that followed."

Piatka hoped that both her book and her play will help people understand "the longevity of trauma and how we must be responsible for not perpetuating that, for stopping war, for stopping violence, for healing the rifts and standing up when you see injustice."

Israeli hoops legends lose charity game to police

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Israeli basketball legends came out of retirement last week for a charity game at Ryerson University against a York Regional Police team.

Labelled a friendly exhibition, the legends, many of whom are in their mid-50s to early 60s, played competitively, keeping the sold-out crowd on its feet for most of the 40-minute game.

"We want to give the crowd their money's worth," said Miki Berkowitz, 55, named as one of the 50 Greatest Euroleague Contributors in 2008.

The crowd of about 500 people was predominately Jewish, mostly Israelis who came to cheer on their former heroes.

The game featured some of the best players Tel Aviv teams have ever produced, including Moti Aroesti, Barry Leibowitz and Doron Jamchi. The team was coached by Israeli Basketball Hall of Fame inductee Tal Brody, said to be the best player in Maccabi Tel Aviv history.

Despite a heart-breaking 53-49 loss to a police team half their ages, the Israeli veterans never showed signs of throwing in the towel.

"We were all once champions on Tel Aviv teams," Berkowitz said. "It's a part of us to play hard."

A four-minute stretch in the second quarter saw Israel take an 11-point lead. Otherwise, the game was within three points until the final minute, when the police took a seven-point lead and held on for the win.

There were plenty of moments that left the crowd in awe, such as 64-year-old Leibowitz's dive for a loose ball, and Berkowitz's three-point shot that made it a one-possession game with a minute to go.

"It's important that we show everyone we don't give up," said Aroesti, who wore Maccabi Tel Aviv's yellow and blue for 15 consecutive seasons.

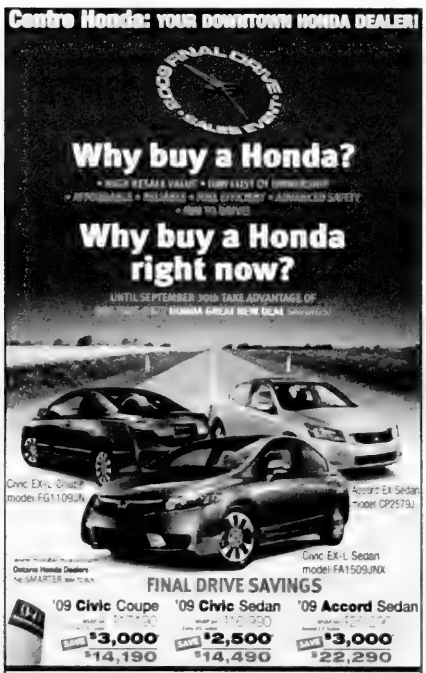
"Toronto is such a nice city, with a beautiful atmosphere and a strong Jewish community. [Israelis] want to build a relationship with Toronto."

The game was held in Toronto to coincide with the Toronto International Film Festival's "City to City" program showcasing Tel Aviv.

"I haven't seen any of the films, but I'm sure they're just as good as the people who made them," Aroesti said. "Between the [basketball] game and the [film] festival, Tel Aviv has a chance to show Toronto and really the world what we're all about and who we really are."

The proceeds from the game will go to the Jewish-Arab David Lewis Soccer and Educational Center in Jaffa, Israel.

"We are very fortunate to have a strong relationship with the Arab community in Jaffa," Berkowitz said. "Hopefully this donation shows our willingness and want to reach out even more."



Temple Kol Ami wins shul baseball league crown

Compiled by CJN Staff

Temple Kol Ami recently captured its first-ever InterSynagogue Baseball League title, defeating defending champion Beth Tzedec Congregation in the final.

After finishing in sixth place with a .500 record in the 10-team league, Kol Ami caught fire, sweeping perennial runners-up Beth Sholom Synagogue in a best-of-three quarter-final with two close, see-saw victories. They went on to dispatch top seed Temple Emanu-El by a single run in the semifinal before meeting Beth Tzedec in the title game.

In the championship game at Bayview Reservoir, Temple Kol Ami surprised even themselves as they built a 15-8 advantage after four innings. But Beth Tzedec outscored Kol Ami 10-1 over the next two innings to take their first lead of the game, 18-16.

Kol Ami, just as they had done throughout the playoffs, answered back in a big way, coming up with a five-run seventh inning. Trailing 23-19 in the bottom of the eighth, Beth Tzedec again showed their mettle with two inside-the-park home runs to take a 24-23 advantage.

With their last at bat, Kol Ami had two on and two out. A routine grounder to second was bobbled momentarily, allowing speedster Jordan Katz to beat the force play. With the bases loaded, a hard ground ball to third by Les White pitted the third basemen in a race to the bag with Katz. Arriving simultaneously, and with the tag applied, it appeared the game was over. But the ball bounced out of the third basemen's glove, allowing the tying run to score.

Toby Gottlieb put his team ahead before Jonathan Zweig added some insurance runs with his second triple of the game. Beth Tzedec went three up, three down in the bottom of the ninth, thanks to outfielder Jake Birman, Katz and second baseman Sam Fruitman.

The final out settled into Fruitman's glove, setting off a wild celebration as Temple Kol Ami captured their first championship, 29-24.

Players from Temple Kol Ami celebrate championship win.

The InterSynagogue Baseball League promotes fun, fair play, and sportsmanship in recreational baseball between members of synagogue brotherhoods in the Toronto area. Games are played every Sunday from May to September, excluding long weekends and Jewish holidays.

Temple Kol Ami hadn't appeared in the finals since 1998, when some of its players were still in elementary school.

Kol Ami became the lowest-seeded team in league history to win the Barry Freeman Championship Trophy.

FACT AND HOPE IN GRAFFITI

Succoth Ruby Caribbean Grapefruit Chicken

2 lg red grapefruits
6 boneless, skinless chicken breasts
1/2 c flour
salt and freshly ground pepper, to taste
6 tblsp unsalted pareve margarine
2/3 c chopped shallots, about 4
1/2 c each light & dark rum
1/2 c honey
1/4 c fresh lime juice
3 tblsp chopped cilantro
1 c chopped green onions, white and 2" of green

Peel grapefruits, divide into segments; remove seeds. Set aside. Cut breasts into 1" strips. Place the flour in shallow plate and season liberally with salt and pepper. Toss chicken in flour. Heat margarine in large nonstick skillet. Add strips; sauté over medium heat, about 5 minutes. Remove from the pan; drain on paper towels. Add chopped shallots to skillet; saute about 4 minutes. Off the heat, add the rums. Bring rums to a boil; reduce for 3 min. Stir in honey and lime juice; simmer 3 minutes. Remove skillet from heat; stir in cilantro, green onions, grapefruit segments. Arrange chicken strips on a platter; pour sauce over.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Although I'm Jewish, I'm not observant in any way. To be honest, I'm not totally sure I even believe in God. But then the High Holidays roll around, and out of respect for my elderly father, I buy holiday tickets and join him in the synagogue. He's a Holocaust survivor, and although he doesn't live his life day to day as an observant Jew, he does pray often, goes to synagogue on most Shabbats, and tries to live a Jewish life as best he can.

Something about the High Holidays affects me deep down. All of a sudden I find myself praying to God, the God I just said I wasn't sure I believed in. I find myself asking for forgiveness and listening intently to what the rabbi says. I feel like the biggest hypocrite doing all this. As I get older, I seem to question many of my actions. What do you think of this weird scenario?

Am I A Believer?

Dear Am I A Believer?

Jews come in many forms. You are Jewish if you were born to a Jewish mother or if you converted halachically. However, being born to a Jewish mother doesn't guarantee what kind of spiritual Jew you'll be. That is decided by you as an individual. As you grow up, your parents do their best to teach you what's important to them, in the hopes you will become a good person, and in some cases a religious one as well. Humans were blessed with the ability to think and make up their own minds. Some use that ability more than others. Just from your short letter I can tell quite a bit about you. I can see that you are a respectful person, a person who doesn't make decisions lightly and who realizes that decisions have consequences. Personally, I think whatever you do as a Jew, you do from your heart, and that means a lot. There are observant Jews who go through the motions, but in day-to-day life they may be dishonest in their dealings with people.

Only you have control of your spirituality, and it comes in many forms, none of which are right or wrong. You must be comfortable in your own skin and do what's best for you. Perhaps if you explore this part of you further, you may find that you're more observant than you believe. Never stop thinking. It's a gift.

Shanah Tovah.

Dreams are renewable

Life Coach Corner

By JUDY SIBLIN-LIBRACH

Renewal. My husband used that word to console me when I thought I'd lost my engagement ring, which I hadn't taken off in 15 years.

When I called him in tears, he consoled me by saying, "That's okay, it's time to get you a new ring anyway, and let's look at this as renewal. It will be like renewing our vows. It's just a thing. Besides, I want to get you one that is even bigger!"

I am a pretty sentimental person, and I just wanted the ring I had never taken off back. Even though it is just a "thing," it has great sentimental value for me. Thank goodness, later that day I found the stone that had inadvertently popped out of the ring when I was rummaging through my daughter's knapsack to give her things to do when we had a long wait to endure, and happily I told my husband the ring was found and just had to be put back together. " A little disappointed?" my husband joked. "That last phone call could have been one of the most expensive calls of my life." But I was so relieved to find that very ring.

What struck me the most about what my husband said was that word "renewal."

What does it mean, and why is it so important to us, especially at this time of year, whether it's renewing your vows, renewing your commitment to the community and to charitable causes, renewing old friendships and maintaining the new ones, renewing your spirituality or religiosity, or what about just renewing your promises to yourself? For some, it might be about being a better person, better spouse, better parent or better human being on this planet. What about personal renewal?

What can you do to renew yourself and get ready for this new year? Renewal for a lot of people means shedding the old to make way for the new, making a new commitment to yourself around health and wellness. This is the time to shed that 10 pounds or jump-start your workout regime. What about adding a 20-minute walk to your day, whether it's around the block or on a treadmill?

So in the act of self-renewal or renewing yourself, is there one change you would like to make about yourself in the new year, one habit you would like to break or new habit you would like to incorporate into your life? Would you like to be calmer, happier, kinder, stronger, braver, more forgiving, greener, fitter? Choose one or two things you would like to achieve and create an intention for yourself around that thing.

It is a powerful exercise to say: "I create an intention for myself to be more organized this year," for instance, and watch how well it works when you carve that intention out for yourself. Writing it down is helpful as well. This baby step will create some renewal in your life, a new way of looking at an old idea, or a new and healthier approach to something you might have found difficult in the past.

And remember always to find, follow and live your bliss – if you do, you will forever be in state of renewal and revitalization.

As Dale E. Turner says: "Dreams are renewable. No matter what our age, or condition, there are still untapped possibilities within us and new beauty waiting to be born."

Shanah Tovah. I wish for yourselves and your families a year filled with renewal, new possibilities, new joy, health and happiness.

Canada takes lead in UN boycott of Ahmadinejad

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad addressed a largely empty chamber at the UN General Assembly last week after numerous delegates walked out during his anti-Israel and anti-West harangue.

The United States, Britain and other nations left as Ahmadinejad delivered yet another broadside aimed at the West, Israel and Jews. Ottawa led the way in boycotting the Iranian leader, announcing the day before that no Canadians would attend Ahmadinejad's address.

Explaining Canada's absence to reporters in Oakville, Ont., Prime Minister Stephen Harper said, "Ahmadinejad's declarations [are]... just disgraceful, insulting declarations denying the Holocaust. There is no way I'm going to permit any official of the government of Canada to be present and give any legitimacy to remarks by a leader like that.

"President Ahmadinejad has said things, particularly about the State of Israel, the Jewish people, and the Holocaust, that are absolutely repugnant," Harper said. "It is unfitting that somebody like that would be giving those kind of remarks before the United Nations General Assembly.

"Canada does not want to be equivocal at all in terms of our view on that. We find it disgraceful, unacceptable, and we're going to be absolutely clear on that. There are other things that bother us as well beyond these repugnant comments – also, obviously, the crackdown in Iran on all kinds, any kind of legitimate dissent. The fiasco around the elections is quite disturbing. As well, the holding of a Canadian journalist – Mr. [Maziar] Bahari, I think it is – without charge continues to be unacceptable [and] we continue to demand his release," Harper said.

"But as I say, there are times when things are being said in this world that it is important that countries that have a moral compass stand up and make their views known,

Parliament mulling Holocaust monument

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The push is on in the House of Commons to try for the establishment of a national Holocaust monument in Ottawa.

A motion was introduced in the house last week by Tim Uppal, Conservative MP for Edmonton-Sherwood Park, as private member's Bill C-442, "An Act to establish a National Holocaust Monument."

The bill passed first reading on Sept. 18 and is now being reviewed by a committee to ensure it is sound before it comes up for second reading.

Uppal's bill also has multi-partisan support. Liberal MP Irwin Cotler and New Democrat MP Judy Wasylycia-Leis have both endorsed it.

In an interview last week, Uppal told The CJN the idea to push for the monument came in the spring from Peter Kent, minister of state for foreign affairs (Americas) and MP for Thornhill – one of the country's largest Jewish ridings. He said Kent responded to Uppal's earlier request to solicit ideas from colleagues for their private member bill priorities, as he had drawn a "good" number at the beginning of Parliament this session.

Christians Raise Cash

HAMILTON — For the second straight year, a group of Christian friends of Israel will hold a fundraiser at the headquarters of Christian Crossroads Communications in Burlington, Ont., to benefit Shechafim Regional Rehabilitation School in Israel's Upper Galilee region. Last year's event drew more than 500 people, mostly Christian, and raised some $14,000. This year's event, on Oct. 20, is being planned by Bob and Sandy Maton of Ancaster, Ont., a suburb of Hamilton, and will feature speakers such as CJN columnist Rabbi Bernard Baskin and David Mainse, founder of Crossroads' daily evangelical talk show 100 Huntley Street.

Shul Suspects Vandals

MONTREAL — Vandalism, not anti-Semitism, was behind the Sept. 14 destruction of two stained glass windows at the Sephardi Petah Tikvah congregation in St. Laurent, its executive director said. "It was probably young people who hang around the area and smoke," said Simone Felece. Two rocks destroyed the windows, valued at $30,000. "It cost another $8,000 to get rid of the broken glass," she added. It was unknown last week if insurance will cover the damage. Felece said it's the first time in her 21 years as executive director that the 300-family shul, built in 1975, has been vandalized. It has security cameras, but the incident took place overnight beyond their range, she said.

Kanee Named To Hall

WINNIPEG — Former Canadian Jewish Congress president Sol Kanee is this year's inductee to Winnipeg's Citizens Hall of Fame. Kanee, who died in 2007 at age 98, was a lawyer and businessman who served on several boards, including as chair of the University of Manitoba's board of governors and the United Way. He was also an officer of the Order of Canada. Inductees to the hall, founded in 1986, include Canwest Global founder Izzy Asper and ex-Tory premier Duff Roblin.

World

Irving Kristol Dies

WASHINGTON — Irving Kristol, a political writer and forebear of neoconservatism, has died. Kristol, dubbed the "godfather of neoconservatism" for his writings rejecting communism, liberalism and counterculture, died Sept. 18 of complications from lung cancer. He was 89. Kristol's son, William, is a neoconservative commentator and the founder and editor of the Weekly Standard.

Men Indicted

MADRID — Three alleged former Nazi death camp guards have been indicted by a Spanish judge on charges of being accessories to genocide and crimes against humanity. Judge Ismael Moreno of the Spanish National Court issued international arrest warrants Sept. 17 against the three men under Spain's observance of the principle of universal jurisdiction, which allows crimes such as genocide, torture or terrorism to be prosecuted in Spain, even if the crimes were committed elsewhere. The three men - Johann Leprich, Anton Tirrjung and Josias Kumpf - are accused of having been members of the Totenkopf SS and serving in death camps. Two are living in the United States while one, Kumpf, is said to be living in Austria.

Rabbi Knew Jackson

LOS ANGELES — Rabbi Shmuley Boteach will release a book based on his interviews with the late Michael Jackson. The celebrity rabbi conducted 30 hours of taped interviews with Jackson more than eight years ago that are said to reveal much about the singer's life, his views on celebrity and what motivated him. They met about 10 years ago and struck up a friendship. "Michael loved coming to our house for Friday night dinners with his kids," the rabbi told the Jewish Week.

Groups File Briefs In End-of-Life Case

NEWARK — Two Orthodox Jewish groups filed a brief in the case of a brain-dead New Jersey man whose family wanted to keep him on life support despite doctors' wishes.

Agudath Israel of America and the Rabbinical Council of America filed an amicus brief Sept. 21 that laid out the case for patient autonomy. The Jewish groups' brief cites numerous cases in New Jersey and elsewhere in which courts ruled that patients and their families have the right to refuse life-sustaining medical care despite objections from the patient's health-care providers. The brief alleges that in effect, the hospital is asserting that patients have a right to choose to die, but not to live.

The man, Ruben Betancourt, 73, suffered oxygen deprivation during surgery in March and was declared to be in a vegetative state. His daughter wanted to keep her father on life support, but doctors claimed they alone should have the final right to decide when a patient is meaningfully alive and when to cease life-sustaining measures. The New Jersey Superior Court ruled Betancourt's daughter had the right to decide her father's care, and the hospital appealed. He died before the appeal was heard.

'Borat' on Simpsons

LOS ANGELES — Actor Sacha Baron Cohen will guest star as an Israeli tour guide on an episode of The Simpsons. Cohen, famed for his Borat and Bruno characters, will voice an angry but funny guide who meets the Simpsons clan on a church-led trip to the Holy Land. The episode, titled "The Greatest Story Ever D'ohed," is slated to air March 28.

Groups Back Obama

NEW YORK — A number of U.S. Jewish groups and rabbis signed an open letter backing President Barack Obama's efforts toward a broader Middle East peace. Leaders of J Street, Americans for Peace Now and the Reconstructionist movement, as well two former presidents of the Reform movement's Central Conference of American Rabbis signed the letter published Sept. 22, saying that "bold American leadership can help Israelis and Palestinians make the difficult decisions necessary to achieve lasting peace and hold the parties to account." Other signatories include the Arab American Institute, Churches for Middle East Peace and the American Task Force for Palestine.

Quebec court won't hear West Bank lawsuit

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Quebec court won't hear a civil suit that a West Bank Palestinian village tried to have adjudicated here against Israeli Jewish settlements.

Bil'in and 11 of its residents want a halt to the construction of housing for Israeli citizens only by two Quebec-registered companies within what may or may not be the town's borders.

In a 67-page decision in which he delves extensively into international law and Israeli case history, Quebec Superior Court judge Louis-Paul Cullen maintained the defendants' motion asking that the court exempt itself from the case.

The judgment also maintains — in part — a second defence motion to dismiss the action and to recognize decisions by Israeli courts related to this dispute.

Cullen said that, although the Superior Court has jurisdiction over this action, Israel's High Court of Justice (HCJ) is "clearly the logical forum and the authority in a better position" to decide it.

A civil action stemming from a wrong suffered in a foreign country could be heard here, because the defendants are domiciled in Quebec, but the local connection in this instance is "merely superficial," he wrote.

He cites an affidavit entered by the defendants from Israeli businessman Gideon Badt, who states that the two businesses "act as alter egos for, and on behalf of, a corporation that is not a resident of Canada and that does not have any assets in Canada," and that Green Park International and Green Mount International have no assets in Quebec or elsewhere in Canada.

They were incorporated in 2004 upon Badt's instructions for Israeli tax reasons only.

Badt also swore that Annette Laroche, Green Park's and Green Mount's sole registered director and officer, didn't participate in any way in the Bil'in development project.

"This judgment does not determine whether Israel or the defendants have perpetrated an illegality," Cullen writes. "It only decides whether the Superior Court will recognize judgments rendered in Israel and, at a later date, hear the merits of the plaintiffs' civil action, where issues of public international law, private international law and domestic law intersect."

The suit was filed in July 2008 by the Village Council of Bil'in along with its former head, Ahmed Issa Abdallah Yassin, who died in January, and 11 of his heirs against Green Park and Green Mount, which are registered at a Montreal area address, and Laroche, who lives in Quebec.

The two companies have been constructing and selling condominiums since 2005 on land that Israel declared state property in 1991 and gave municipal jurisdiction over to the council of Modi'in Illit. Bil'in claims it has jurisdiction over the land and that two parcels of it were owned by the late Yassin.

Cullen concludes that the Bil'in council, although it's the official, elected municipal authority, couldn't under Quebec law represent the village's residents in this action, even if its claim of jurisdiction over the land is true.

He notes that Canadian law prohibits criminal prosecution without the Attorney General's authorization. "Although this action is civil, it is predicated on the finding that Israel is committing a war crime in violation of public international law."

The plaintiffs, whose lead Canadian lawyer was Mark Arnold of Toronto, argued that Green Park and Green Mount are acting not only for their own profit but as "agents of the State of Israel… conspiring" in a policy of transferring its civilian population into an area under military occupation, pushing out Arab residents.

They alleged that this is illegal and, in effect, a "war crime" under international law, specifically the Fourth Geneva Convention, the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, as well as the Crimes Against Humanity and War Crimes Act adopted by Canada in 2000. They say it also violates Quebec's Charter of Human Rights and Freedoms and Civil Code.

They sought a declaration by the Quebec court on the alleged illegality, an immediate injunction against any further construction and demolition of the existing residential units and restoration of the property to the way it was before. They also asked for $2 million in punitive damages from the company and $25,000 from Laroche.

For the new year, new study material

From the editor's desk...

We all know that the midrashim, axioms and aphorisms of our ancient sages, are aimed at making our behaviour toward others more consciously humane and thoughtful.

One midrash among the countless many that stands out in that regard instructs us that upon entry into the afterlife, we will be asked three questions by the Ultimate Judge: During the course of our lives, were we honest in our business or professional dealings? Did we give tzedakah? Did we regularly set aside time for study?

In other words, the way we deal with other human beings occupies not only a vital social compartment of our lives. It occupies a high-priority theological one as well. This is reinforced by the inclusion of the third heavenly question.

The imperative to set aside regular time for study is important for its own sake to be sure. But it's also important, as our Sages pointed out, too, because it must inevitably lead to heightened knowledge of the key, life-affirming values of our religion, chief among which is the way we deal with other human beings.

Given the central place of regular study in the heart of Jewish life, it is appropriate that at the start of the new year I share with readers information that has recently come across my desk regarding new study materials.

For individuals interested in biblical studies, two new publications are especially noteworthy.

The Jewish Bible: A JPS Guide (The Jewish Publication Society, Philadelphia, 2008) is a convenient, helpful, English-language companion to studying the Bible. It is akin to a metal detector that helps you locate and appreciate the innumerable iron nuggets of treasure within the Tanach.

The guide was edited and published by the JPS with advisers Shalom Paul, Fred Greenspahn and Ziony Zevit. It features numerous contributions by leading scholars on a range of vitally interconnected subjects, such as the origins of the Bible, storytelling and poetry in the Bible, law, prophecy, wisdom literature and a glossary of Bible terms.

The guide is invaluable to the lay person daunted by the nature and profundity of biblical writing. It will also be handy for the scholar, who will find in its pages new formulations of familiar material.

The guide was recognized this year by the Association of American University Presses as one of the "Best of the Best" books in its 19th edition of University Press Books Selected for Public and Secondary School Libraries.

Perush HaRashbam al HaTorah, Torah commentary by the Rashbam, written by Prof. Martin Lockshin of York University has just been released by Chorev Press in Jerusalem.

The Rashbam is the respectfully affectionate acronym of the first letters in the name of Rabbi Samuel ben Meir. Rabbi Samuel was the grandson of Rashi, pre-eminent anchor of all subsequent biblical scholars. Rabbi Samuel lived in the 12th century and continued, refined and encouraged inquisitive, challenging inquiry into biblical text.

Lockshin, a frequent contributor to The CJN and himself an exemplar if not also an inheritor of many of the Rashbam's key traits of honest – though humble – intellectual Torah inquiry, le shaym Shamayim (for the sake of Heaven) has written the introduction and detailed notes of the two-volume work entirely in Hebrew. In itself, this is a significant publishing achievement.

As his colleague Prof. Michael Brown pointed out at the recent launch for the book, the fact that the work is written in Hebrew "ensures that the publication will be read by those who will learn the most."

The Perush (Commentary) adds to a millennial body of scholarship in which expert and lay person can both sail. It should be pointed out that Lockshin, who is also an ordained rabbi, earlier completed the English-language version of the work.

For individuals interested in legal, political and social commentary, the Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies at the Shalem Center in Jerusalem has recently launched a new website. (www.adelsoninstitute.org.il)

The site will excite the intellectual and possibly even emotional sensibilities of all those for whom the existence of Israel and the upholding of the values that underpin democracy are sacrosanct. It features essays, articles, commentary and analysis of superb and inspiring quality by leading scholars and experts such as Martin Kramer, Yossi Klein Halevi and Uriya Shavit.

These writings are in furtherance of the mission of the institute, an academic and research institute founded by Natan Sharansky in 2007.

The mission of the institute, in part, "develops, articulates and builds support for the strategic principles needed to address the challenges currently facing Israel and the West.

"It seeks, among its other aims, to examine international law in light of the new forms of asymmetric warfare and terror; the establishment of credible deterrence against guerrilla and terror organizations and the states that sponsor them; the appropriate response to weapons of mass destruction; and the strengthening of Israel's relations with its strategic allies."

Now we must set aside some time to study.

WHERE TEMPLE PILGRIMS BATHED

A large mikvah was recently discovered by the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) in digs it's conducting in the underground Western Wall tunnels in co-operation with the Western Wall Heritage Foundation. The 2,000-year-old mikvah is from the Second Temple period and was likely used by Jewish pilgrims or visitors to purify themselves before ascending the steps to the Temple Mount. The mikvah was discovered inside the western hall of a structure located some 20 metres from the Western Wall. Parts of the building were discovered in the past and the IAA is currently exposing another one of the three halls inside it. It's one of the most magnificent structures from the Second Temple period ever to be uncovered.

Israel-bashing not tied to Palestinians: author

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Daniel Gordis has a message for the pro-Israel community – the current wave of Israel-bashing has nothing to do with the Palestinians at all.

In Toronto to give a keynote address to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Top Gifts dinner last month, Gordis told The CJN during a wide-ranging interview that "there's something else going on in the world" when it comes to the "demonization" of the Jewish state.

Daniel Gordis

Gordis is an author and the senior vice-president of The Shalem Center, a Jerusalem-based think-tank and college. He made aliyah from the United States with his family in 1998.

A Swedish newspaper accusing Israel Defence Forces soldiers of harvesting Palestinian organs, Spain using a Holocaust denier as a "Holocaust expert," and Hollywood actors singling out the Toronto International Film Festival for its partnership with Israeli cinema; these things "can't be related" to the Palestinians, he said.

"The Palestinian issue is very easy to solve. They acknowledge our right to be. We redraw the borders. They have a state, we have a state. Everybody knows that's how it's gonna work out," Gordis said.

"Something much more pernicious is actually going on with the demonization of Israel. And it's for two reasons," he said. "Number 1: Israel is a model to the world of what can happen when people really believe that your cause is just. That makes the world uncomfortable, I would suggest. That's the reason for the hostility to Israel."

His second point revolves around worldviews toward human heterogeneity.

"Israel is also about [showing] that there is human dignity to be seen in heterogeneity. We're not all one big happy human family. The French are different from the Germans, who are different from the Danes and so on," he said.

As Jews, he said, we feel our own uniqueness when we go to Israel because of our love for the land, common language and history.

Gordis said that much of the world is obsessed with a post-modernist ideology to "blur" differences among nations, while Israel presents a "clarion call saying this is not the way it has to, or ought to be. And Israel is the state that has been the most successful in preserving its own identity."

His basic point, he said, is that the antagonism toward Israel is more about what the country stands for rather than any actions it takes with regard to other Middle East peoples or states.

"And our obligation is to defend [Israel]," he said.

Asked why he thinks a tiny country like Israel could provoke such a visceral reaction in countries and societies so far away from it, Gordis replied: "I can't answer you. It's an impossible question. All over the world there are millions of people being killed. In Darfur, in Rwanda, in Southeast Asia… they don't make the front pages of the New York Times, [but] the Middle East is there every single day."

Gordis said he thinks it has to do with a "new version" of anti-Semitism in the world.

"Anti-Semitism morphs," he said. "At a period in which the world was conceived in terms of religion, anti-Semitism was fundamentally religious anti-Semitism. When the world reconceived itself in terms of nations, anti-Semitism [morphed] to exclude the Jews from Germany and France and so on."

He said the new anti-Semitism comes in the form of anti-Israelism, though that's not to say that anyone who criticizes Israel is anti-Semitic.

"You can criticize Israel. But this international jumping on Israel, I think, is the same perplexing phenomenon of 'Why are the Jews always the centre of attention?' I mean, we're an insignificant percentage of the world's population."

With regard to the differences in perspectives on Israel between Diaspora and Israeli Jews, Gordis said Jews outside Israel can understand a good deal about what it must feel like to be an Israeli caught in the spotlight of world enmity and in range of an enemy, Iran, who threatens to annihilate them.

But he said what Diaspora Jews cannot understand is the "fatigue of what it's like to live so that every year, there's a new crisis."

Gordis shared an anecdotal story about his son, currently serving in the IDF, who refused to read a speculative story about Gilad Schalit's life in captivity.

"I asked him if he'd read the story and he said, 'I don't think that's a story I should read.' And I realized that my son is living day to day with the knowledge that if an [IDF] operation that he's involved with goes wrong, [Schalit's situation] could happen to him.

"As a parent, ask yourself what it means for your kid to live with that thought day in and day out. That's the thing Israeli parents live through. Some little thing that reminds you you're living an abnormal existence.

"Your typical [North American Jew] does not think about this type of thing. Whether you're sitting in Los Angeles, New York or Toronto… for Diaspora Jews this is hard to get. They forget that what seems to be the smart thing [for Israel] to do, when they 'root' for Israel sitting on Eglinton Avenue in a café, is not the same as the smart thing to do when you've just sent your second kid to the army and you're living with this angst year after year."

Last month, Gordis released his new book Saving Israel: How the Jewish People Can Win a War That May Never End (Wiley).

A UN disgrace

When it was his turn to address the United Nations General Assembly last Thursday in New York, Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu minced no words. His anger was white hot. Indignation flashed from his eyes like a laser beam disintegrating rock. He reproached the assembly for having given Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad yet another opportunity and another forum for advocating genocide.

"Yesterday, the man who calls the Holocaust a lie spoke from this podium," Netanyahu said. "To those who refused to come here and to those who left this room in protest, I commend you. You stood up for moral clarity and you brought honour to your countries.

"But to those who gave this Holocaust-denier a hearing, I say on behalf of my people, the Jewish people, and decent people everywhere: Have you no shame? Have you no decency?

"A mere six decades after the Holocaust, you give legitimacy to a man who denies that the murder of six million Jews took place and pledges to wipe out the Jewish state. What a disgrace! What a mockery of the charter of the United Nations!"

Four days before he came to the General Assembly, Ahmadinejad told a rally in Tehran that, "After World War II, [Jews] created the story of Holocaust... and then they made hundreds of films and wrote hundreds of books to argue they have suffered and need a home... This is a myth, and Zionists are criminals."

From the General Assembly podium, he continued his diatribe against Jews. "It is no longer acceptable that a small minority would dominate the politics, economy and culture of major parts of the world by its complicated networks and establish a new form of slavery and harm the reputation of other nations, even European nations and the U.S. to attain its racist ambitions."

Netanyahu's reaction was the only sane, civil and appropriate one: "What a disgrace!"

To its great credit, Canada was among the governments that refused to participate in the mockery. Prime Minister Stephen Harper had delivered express instructions to the Canadian delegation not to be present for the Iranian leader's speech. Canadians of all stripes understand and agree with the need to forcefully rebuke the dangerous Iranian regime. Indeed, despite the intrusion of inter-party politics and election-style rhetoric, Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff supported the prime minister's decision.

In this expression of understanding and agreement among the majority of Canadians regarding Iran is the essence of the urgent task facing the international community. Every available tool must be employed to stop Iran from building a nuclear weapon. The spotlight must not shift from this one over-riding, all-important objective. For the danger emanating from Iran is far more extensive than missiles aimed at Israel. As history has shown and as Netanyahu reminded the world last week, "what starts with attacks on the Jews eventually ends up engulfing many others."

25 years ago in The CJN

After a 12-day tour of the USSR, televangelist Billy Graham said oppression of Soviet Jews had lessened in recent years, ever since the days of Soviet leader Leonid Brezhnev, and especially compared to the days of Stalin and in the immediate aftermath of the Bolshevik revolution.

Change the narrative for Israel

Reading material critical of Israel, it appears that the underlying criticism is that the Palestinians were the indigenous peoples of Palestine and the Jews were colonial invaders.

Jews should therefore change the narrative they use to justify the Jewish state to the world, so that the Jewish people will appear as the indigenous people of the Land of Israel, and the Arabs/Muslims/Palestinians will appear as the colonial invaders.

In the Jew's current narrative, they had a homeland 2,000 years ago, but after being defeated militarily, they went into exile and returned with the rise of the Zionist movement. Many people – Jews, Arabs and others – interpret such a story as tantamount to the Jews abandoning their country, with the Palestinians inheriting it. So when Jews started arriving in the Land of Israel under Zionist auspices, many people consider that the Jews were coming to some other people's land, hence "colonial invaders."

Although it is widely believed that for the last 2,000 years there were no Jews in the Land of Israel, in fact Jewish continuity in the Land of Israel was never interrupted. A case can be made that since the Jews never abandoned or surrendered their land, it never ceased being a Jewish possession.

Whatever the legalities of the matter, emphasis of Jewish justification for the State of Israel should switch from Jewish travails in the Diaspora to all the stories that illustrate that the Jews preserved their continuity in the Land of Israel through these 2,000 years, often with necessary help from the Jews in the Diaspora.

Day school funding

In his speech to the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto on the occasion of reaffirming Ontario's commitment to assisting the UJA's Tomorrow Campaign, Premier Dalton McGuinty waxes effusive in his praise of the Jewish community and states that he is proud to support us in our endeavours ("McGuinty repledges $15M to Tomorrow Campaign," Sept. 17). He goes so far as to quote mishnaic passages in lauding our community's commitment to ensuring our future. In light of McGuinty's campaign against the support of fairness in the funding of faith-based education in our province, only one word comes to mind when reading the speech of the premier: nauseating!

The joy of music

Thank you, Dr. Michael Gordon, for your wonderful article on "The joy and benefits of music" (Sept. 3). You were indeed lucky to be brought up in musical family. I was blessed and lucky, too, to have had a Bubbe Bessie and Aunt Sara. Neither were trained in voice or could play a musical instrument, but they will forever be remembered leading the singing in English and Yiddish to hundreds of people who were huddled, night after night, in an underground air raid shelter in Stepney London throughout the World War II blitz.

Despite the non-stop bombing, young and old sang popular songs, and with added spontaneous cockney humour. It is among my most precious experiences in life, which has personally held me in good stead.

Today, at the Reuben Cipin Healthy Living Community, we have ongoing programs and events, which include music and humour, and this has considerably helped to make our residence "the" place to live.

It also confirms the doctor's common-sense message to seniors and families "to get out there and sing, play, listen to and promote anything and everything related to music."

And I humbly add that from music, together with humour, "the joy can be endless, and the benefits seem to be extraordinary," as the doctor says.

Palestinians must accept Israel as Jewish state: Netanyahu

By NATASHA MOZGOVAYA
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu told Ha'aretz last week he would not agree to a Palestinian demand that Israel accept the 1967 borders as a condition for renewing peace negotiations.

Netanyahu also made a condition of his own – that he would never drop his demand that the Palestinians recognize Israel as a Jewish state.

"I told Abu Mazen [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas] I believe peace hinges first on his readiness to stand before his people and say, 'We… are committed to recognizing Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People,'" Netanyahu said.

"I will not drop this subject and other important issues under any final peace agreement," Netanyahu said.

Netanyahu said that U.S. President Barack Obama's speech to the UN General Assembly last Wednesday was "positive" because "he also said something we had been seeking for six months – that we have to meet and begin the diplomatic process without preconditions."

Obama had spoken "clearly about Israel as the nation-state of the Jewish People," Netanyahu said. "I believe that disagreement about this is the root of the conflict."

Netanyahu also pointed out that Obama had made reference to Israeli efforts to improve the Palestinian economy by lifting roadblocks.

Obama's speech on Wednesday was one of many from world leaders, and the American president focused part of his talk on efforts to be made toward Middle East peace.

"The goal is clear," Obama told the General Assembly, "two states living side by side in peace and security – a Jewish State of Israel, with true security for all Israelis; and a viable, independent Palestinian state with contiguous territory that ends the occupation that began in 1967 and realizes the potential of the Palestinian people."

Referring to Obama's statement, Netanyahu said, "The things he said about the occupation are not new. He also said them in Cairo, and in fact, that is the formula adopted by the 'road map' [peace plan] and it does not say we have to go back to the 1967 borders.

"This is the formula adopted by governments before the one I head, which did not agree to go back to the 1967 borders. We certainly would [also] not agree to that. In the matter of the settlements he also said nothing new. These disagreements should not prevent the beginning of the process which, among other things if it is successful, will also decide this issue."

Netanyahu said Obama, like other American presidents, reflected the deep, basic friendship between the American and the Israeli people, and that "he stood in Cairo before the whole Muslim world and said this relationship would never be severed." Netanyahu added that he believes the obligation of the United States to Israel's security is total.

When asked about claims that last Tuesday's three-way summit with Abbas and Obama would become an excuse for foot-dragging, Netanyahu responded, "not on our part."

Netanyahu told Channel 2 that Obama's speech to the United Nations regarding negotiations without preconditions and the two-state solution was "an important blessing.

"The president said, 'Let's come and resume the peace process without preconditions.' As you know, I have been saying that for nearly six months. I was happy," Netanyahu said.

However, Israelis and Palestinians said Wednesday that their envoys would meet with U.S. officials but not with each other, cementing the impression that the summit had produced few results.

Chief Palestinian Authority (PA) negotiator Saeb Erekat said there would be no followup session with the Israelis because the two sides hadn't bridged the divides that have prevented them from resuming talks.

"It's not happening because we agreed to continue dealing with the Americans until we reach the agreement that will enable us to relaunch the negotiations," Erekat said.

Israeli government spokesperson Mark Regev said Israel would dispatch envoys to meet with U.S. officials in Washington, but there were no plans now to meet again with the Palestinians.

He said, however, that it was Israel's "sincere hope that we will see the restart of direct Israeli-Palestinian talks."

The Palestinians refuse to restart talks until Israel freezes settlement construction. They also want talks to restart where they left off before breaking down earlier this year, something Netanyahu has refused.

Netanyahu told several U.S. network television stations late Wednesday that Obama had also assured him he was committed to stopping Iran's nuclear program.

Asked if he knew how long it was before Iran could produce a nuclear weapon, Netanyahu told ABC interviewer Charlie Gibson that he didn't "want to discuss whether we need another week or another month.

"The crucial question is: what's the goal? And the president assured me time and again that the goal is to prevent Iran from developing a nuclear weapon. And I think that's the right goal," Netanyahu said.

The prime minister added that he sees Iran as "the major sponsor of world terrorism. Now, imagine what terrorism could be if the terrorists had a patron that gave them a nuclear umbrella, or worse, if that patron actually gave them nuclear weapons.

"That's a nightmare scenario, and we all have to ensure that it doesn't happen," Netanyahu told ABC.

He also reiterated comments he made recently about what he considered the instability of the current regime in Tehran, saying he believes "this regime is a lot weaker than people think, and I think the civilized countries are a lot stronger than they tend to think about themselves.

"This regime tyrannizes its own people, guns them down when they peacefully protest for freedom," he added.

"There are so many reasons, endless reasons why this should not be allowed to happen. And it's time the international community acted in unison to make sure that it doesn't happen," Netanyahu said.

In an interview with Fox News, Netanyahu commented on the possibility of unilateral action against Iran, saying "any country has and reserves the right to self-defence, and Israel is no exception. But I think the spectre of Iran arming itself with nuclear weapons and possibly giving them to terrorists… [is] sufficiently troublesome for the international community to get its act together and act to stop this from happening."

In response to a question, Netanyahu said he is convinced Iran does want a nuclear weapon.

On the subject of renewing peace negotiations with the PA, Netanyahu told NBC's Matt Lauer that he is "willing to make gestures to help the peace process."

When asked how big a gesture Israel intends to make, Netanyahu said: "We'll get there very soon, I suppose.

"But I'll tell you one thing I'm not willing to do. I can't freeze life," he added, referring to a possible West Bank settlement freeze, insisted on by Abbas.

"There are a quarter of a million people there, in these communities which are called 'settlements,' although really most of them are bedroom suburbs of Tel Aviv and Jerusalem."

Echoing the same sentiment, the prime minister said he was looking "to reconcile two things. One is to start the peace process again, something that I'm glad [about] – I hope that we started today.

"And, second, to enable normal life to continue. There are a quarter of a million people living in these communities. They need kindergartens. They need schools. They need health clinics," Netanyahu said.

"They're living. I'm committed not to build new settlements. I am committed not to expropriate additional land for existing settlements. But people have to live. You can't freeze life."

Stressing what he felt is the shared Palestinian responsibility for stalled peace talks, Netanyahu told ABC that "anytime Israel met an Arab leader who has genuinely committed to peace, such as Anwar Sadat, we made peace," adding that the government who achieved peace with Egypt "was a Likud government under Menachem Begin.

"When Yitzhak Rabin, the Labour prime minister, met the late King Hussein [of Jordan], who wanted peace, we made peace," the premier said, adding that peace could be made "if the Palestinian leadership says, 'We want peace, we recognize Israel as the Jewish state, the nation state of the Jewish people, just as we're asked to recognize the Palestinian state as the nation state of the Palestinian people.'"

Netanyahu concluded by saying that Israel wants "a real peace… We don't want a peace where we hand over territory which becomes a base for Iran's proxy so they can fire thousands of rockets on us, one of the tiniest countries in the world.

"Now, if you're the size of Monaco or the size of Luxembourg, that by itself doesn't pose a security problem. But if your neighbours also say, 'We're going to destroy you or throw you into the sea and fire thousands of rockets at you,' that does pose a security problem," Netanyahu said. "So, Israel wants both recognition and security from its neighbours, and this will be the task of the negotiations in the coming months."

Opinions

Who should get our tzedakah?

I believe we all owe it to our children and grandchildren to scrutinize our giving patterns. How do we use our charity to help others? What is our responsibility in giving charity. Can we to seek recipients who abide by values that we advocate?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Again and again, my family, friends and colleagues give donations to individuals and institutions whose practices differ widely from their own. I understand the obvious necessity to give to those in need, but there are so many who need our help that we do have choices. Yes, give to the needy. But why select those whose basic philosophy so differs from one's own?

Why if you are a Zionist would you give to religious groups that are anti-Zionist? Or if you are supportive of education for women, why give to those communities that restrict women's education. Or worse, how can one give without even knowing an organization's policy in key areas?

One friend always asks petitioners, "What do you do to help agunot [women who cannot receive their Jewish divorce]?" Another told me he asks recipients to sing Hatikvah with him first.

Accountability – ours as well as theirs – should be an important element in setting our priorities.

The consequences of our giving patterns are far reaching. If we use our funds to support institutions we agree with, we provide for a flourishing future Jewish life. But if we support those whose lifestyle opposes ours, then what will the future hold for our own descendants? Will they reject us, choose to emulate others or will they not have the institutional support they require for a world like ours? It's our choice.

My children often remind me that they responsibly limited their family because of the high cost of Jewish day schools (no this is not a joke). Yet, we give money to those who refused to act so responsibly and have numerous children. Is that fair? Why not give our education charity to the schools that support the lifestyle of our children? Let the haredi supplicant be responsible to earn his or her own living and support their own multiple children. Why not? It's their choice.

Giving is our obligation. To whom we give should also be our obligation.

I know I'm being unfair to the many charitable organizations that legitimately require our assistance. But it's appropriate that charitable organizations stand up to communal standards and scrutiny. It's proper that you and I give according to our standards and preferences. It's our choice.

An encounter with two wondrous Jews

The week of Parshat Ki Tavo, our synagogue hosted two of the most incredible young people I have ever met. As the parshah is concerned with the Israelites' entrance into the land, it was fitting that our speakers were two young Ethiopian Jews from Israel, here on a month-long internship with local law firms.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Erez Naga, 30, arrived in Israel in 1984 at the age of four. Jerus Truneh, a bit younger at 26, came when she was 10. Erez left his village with hundreds of other Jews hoping that they would be able to realize their dream of Jerusalem. They walked for months across the Sudanese desert, and about one-quarter of their comrades died before reaching a refugee camp.

They knew nothing of what had happened in the world over the past 2,500 years to the Jews elsewhere. They trace their lineage back to exiles from the destruction of the First Temple in 586 BCE. They believed that they were the last Jews on Earth, until an Israeli shaliach came to their village to tell them about the Jewish state.

"When we arrived in Israel, we were shocked to see so many sick people," he said. "All the Jews were so – white!" (Much laughter from the congregation.)

"I was lucky. Almost all of my family made it – my little brother died in the desert, but my family of 400 [gasps from the congregation] was lucky that most of us reached Israel."

He spent four years in the Israeli army. What was that experience like?

"In the army, there was not discrimination. We watched each others' backs. Our lives depended on each other. But when we left the army, we all went back to our own ghettos."

Jerus came later. Her parents, too, were focused on education for their children, which enabled her to reach law school. Currently, she volunteers with other Ethiopian youth, mentoring them, tutoring them where necessary, and above all inspiring them to be anything they want to be.

"So many do not think they can achieve. When I asked one student what she wanted to be, said she wanted to be a cleaner like her older brother. I asked why, when she had so many other choices. She said because he had a good job – which indeed he does, at a major hotel. But I wanted her to be so much more."

"There are only four Ethiopian Jewish lawyers in Israel today," she said with some distress.

When Ethiopian Jews thought of return to their homeland, they thought of Jerusalem and the biblical-era land of Israel. They had no idea that 2,500 years after their ancestors were exiled from the land, a new state of Israel had been in existence for 60 years.

In Ki Tavo we are told that once the Israelites entered the land, they are to recite the blessings and the curses, to bring a tithe of their first produce to the Temple, and to carefully observe all the commandments given to them by Moshe in the desert.

They had certain responsibilities to remember their past wanderings by reciting, when bringing the first fruits, "A wandering Aramean was my father."

Imagine the wanderings of the Ethiopian Jews. Imagine their joy, and their consternation, when they reached the real Jerusalem, with its cacophony of voices and demands.

I asked the young woman about the holiday of Sigd. "It is the holiday where the priests would go up to a mountain, imagining they are standing once again at Sinai, and praying for return to Jerusalem," she told me. "Even after we came to Israel, they go every year up to a mountain and pray."

Is their community still deeply religious? Apparently while the elders retain their deep commitment, many of the second generation no longer practise their traditional faith, identifying more with secular sabras.

Like so many other immigrant groups in Israel, they found that Israeli society and the dream of biblical Israel present totally different realities. We can hope that Ethiopian Jews will retain the strengths of their community, while enriching Israel, and indeed the whole Jewish world.

Welcome spiritual 'guests' into the sukkah

As our holiday of thanksgiving, Sukkot feels almost like a respite after the intense themes of Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

Sukkot are built beside homes and synagogues, and the ceremony we conduct with the lulav and etrog is incorporated into daily prayer. Besides family and friends, we welcome spiritual "guests," or ushpizin to share the holiday with us – Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Moses, Aaron, Joseph, David and, for many families, our matriarchs as well. I cannot even imagine what these biblical figures think of our world when they join us in the sukkah.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

It is an interesting concept, that of inviting our biblical forebearers to join us in our celebration of thanksgiving. But there are also other Jews from the more recent past who I would like to welcome to our sukkah in order to glean from them wisdom that might benefit us in confronting the many challenges of modern life. My list is long, but here are a few of our Jewish antecedents who could possibly help us better understand and cope with current complexities.

I would love to spend time with Albert Einstein. I would ask him questions that intrigue both the scientist and the non-scientist. These would include an assessment of the many advances since his death, particularly in the area of nuclear physics, and his view of the major unanswered scientific questions that must be addressed in the years ahead. I would also ask him of his views of the geopolitical realities of today, particularly as they relate to Middle Eastern politics.

I would also like to meet some of the great leaders and founders of modern Israel, including David Ben-Gurion, the first prime minister of Israel, and Chaim Weizmann, the first president of Israel and the founder of the world-famous Weizmann Institute of Science. I would also ask Israeli prime minister Golda Meir to join our group. I would seek some answers from them on the current Middle East situation, including the peace process. I would be interested in their assessment of the "new" anti-Semitism, evidenced by the selective isolation and vilification of Israel, a means by which many anti-Semites try to hide their hateful intent. I suspect these guests would not be surprised.

I would also like to meet the leaders of the uprising in the Warsaw Ghetto during the dark days of Nazi domination of Europe and extend to them my admiration of their courage.

Art and music would be an integral part of these Sukkot activities. I would invite Irving Berlin as a representative of the great Jewish songwriters and composers of the 20th century and let him know that his musical legacy lives on. As well, Marc Chagall should be present to share his vision of the importance of the visual arts in uplifting the spirit of the Jewish experience.

I would also enjoy meeting Ilan Ramon, Israel's first and only astronaut. He was a member of the crew that tragically perished as the Columbia shuttle exploded upon re-entry to the atmosphere, almost seven years ago. I am reminded of his accomplishment and his bravery by a report that his son, Capt. Assaf Ramon, recently died when his military airplane crashed on a training mission.

As a lawyer and a teacher of law, I am impressed by many great Jewish jurists of the past. For example, I would love to meet Felix Frankfurter, an associate justice of the Supreme Court of the United States from 1939 to 1962, who was appointed by president Franklin Roosevelt. He was succeeded by another Jewish justice on that court, Arthur Goldberg.

Throughout history, Jews have contributed to the betterment of the world through their talents, discoveries, vision and sacrifices. Their attributes, wisdom and actions have left a continued legacy of which we can all be proud.

At this celebration of thanksgiving, who will be your ushpizin? Who, in your view, has lived a life that has significantly and permanently enlightened the world? Who will you invite to share your sukkah?

Polish Catholics discover their Jewish roots

During the Holocaust in Poland, hundreds, perhaps thousands, of desperate Jewish parents facing the imminence of death handed over their children to Polish Catholics for safekeeping, hoping to be reunited with them one day. In many cases, the parents were murdered and no such joyous reunion ever took place.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

But since the fall of communism in Poland in 1989, at least 700 Jews raised by Christians have come forward, says Poland's chief rabbi, Michael Schudrich. Many other such Jews, comfortable with their status as Catholics, have remained silent. "They already have a life," he said. "The ones who haven't declared themselves are latter-day Marranos." Still others, he noted, do not even realize they are Jewish. Recently, the Vatican announced that it would attempt to track down these individuals.

Alongside this footnote of the Holocaust is a related phenomenon: Catholics who have discovered their Jewish roots. Since the end of the Communist era, Poles of Jewish descent have grappled with their dual identity, sometimes with difficulty and angst.

Elzbieta Ficowska, who was born in the Warsaw Ghetto on Jan. 5, 1942, half a year before the Nazis began to liquidate it, is one of the "hidden" Jewish children.

Sensing a clear and present danger, Ficowska's parents, Josef and Henia Koppel, had her secretly delivered in a wooden case to a Catholic midwife, Stanislawa Bussold, when she was six months old. Bussold, then in her late 50s, knew Irene Sendler, a social worker and member of the Council to Aid Jews (Zegota), which smuggled about 2,500 children out of the ghetto before its destruction in the spring of 1943.

Having been spirited out of the ghetto, Elzbieta was baptized, a small silver spoon engraved with her name and birthday serving as her birth certificate. Her father was shot in July 1942 in Warsaw, while her mother died in a Nazi camp, Poniatowa, in 1943.

Bussold treated Elzbieta with tender loving care. "She gave me happiness and a childhood full of love," said Ficowska, a Solidarity trade union activist in the 1980s and a children's writer whose husband, Jerzy, died in 2006. "I never felt like an orphan. She was the best mother in the world." At the age of 17, Ficowska learned in dribs and drabs from Bussold – who died in 1968 – that she was of Jewish origin. "It was an emotional moment."

Ficowska scoured archives in the hope of finding photographs of her parents, but to no avail.

But years later, she met her biological mother's friends in Israel and the United States, and they described her parents' physical features. "My father, a banker, was tall and swarthy and 20 years older than my mother. She was in her 20s, blond, green-eyed, very pretty."

Asked if she feels Jewish despite her Catholic upbringing, Ficowska replied, "It's a very difficult question. I feel Jewish when anti-Semitism is in the air." Citing an example, she recalled having been urged to leave Poland by the police during the 1968 state-sponsored anti-Semitic campaign. Asked if she considers herself a Catholic, she said, "It doesn't matter. I believe in God." Ficowska, whose daughter was baptized, has attended both church and synagogue services. "I feel no emotional connection to the synagogue. It seems exotic." But she is drawn to Israel, which she has visited on numerous occasions.

Elzbieta Ficowska

For many years, she was president of an organization founded by hidden Jewish children like herself. One of its members, her friend Renata Zajdman, lives in Montreal. By chance, I met Zajdman while interviewing Ficowska in a Warsaw café.

Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel is a 66-year-old Catholic priest and professor at the Catholic University in Lublin.

At the age of 35, he discovered that he was originally Jewish, his stepmother having given him the shocking news. He was not entirely surprised, since he did not resemble his stepparents, looked "different," and had been called a "Jew bastard" by drunks. After discovering that his parents, Yacov and Batia, had given him to a Polish woman shortly after his birth in 1943, he found out that they, as well as his elder brother, had been killed.

Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel

In an attempt to connect with his Jewish past, he plans to settle in Israel in October. Before the war, he noted, his parents dreamed of making aliyah. When he applied to immigrate under Israel's Law of Return, his request was delayed, but eventually, he was issued a two-year residency visa. Born in a town in what is now Lithuania, he plans to study Hebrew at an ulpan at Kibbutz Sde Eliyahu. Later, he intends to delve into Jewish history.

Variously describing himself as "a little Jewish church mouse and a Jew from Jesus," he said he chose the priesthood as an act of defiance against his secular stepfather.

"I will always remain a Catholic priest," he said. "I don't see any reason for crossing out this part of my life. Psychologically, I will never leave Poland, and Poland will never leave me." Weksler-Waszkinel added, "Poland will always be my fatherland and Israel will be my homeland." Ficowska, who knows him quite well, thinks that his double identity is a problem. "He can't find his place," she said with a touch of sadness.

There is no shortage of Poles, born after the Holocaust, who have dabbled with their partial Jewish identity.

Katarzyna C., 24, was born in Wroclaw and lives in Krakow today. She prefers to remain anonymous, though she is president of Czulent, a local organization whose members explore their Jewish antecedents through discussions and lectures. When she was 13, she accidentally stumbled upon the fact that her grandfather is Jewish. Although she was raised as a Catholic by her Christian mother and half-Jewish father, she considers herself Jewish. Her sister does not. Her parents respect her decision to be Jewish, but they associate Jewishness with anti-Semitism.

"My generation is fine with being Jewish. My Jewish identity is a matter of choice, but is not full without my Polish identity. My social life is more and more connected with the Jewish community." When she was 18, she went to Israel with the Birthright program. She liked Israel, but can't relate to its culture. "My heritage is in Poland," she said.

Katarzyna Zimmerer, 47, is a Krakow historian who has written books on the fate of Jews in Krakow during the Nazi occupation. Her mother comes from an assimilated Jewish family and was hidden in a convent during the war. Her father, a German Marxist and a journalist, settled in Poland in 1956. Raised as an atheist, Zimmerer was baptized so that she would not stand out in school. A single parent who also had her daughter baptized, she began identifying as a Jew in 1993 after attending the Jewish Cultural Festival. Yet her Polish identity is very important to her.

Malgorzata Ornat

Wojciech Ornat

Malgorzata Ornat, 43, and her husband, Wojciech, 47, own the Jewish publishing house Austeria and run Klezmer Hois, a hotel and restaurant in Krakow's Kazimierz district.

In 1987, her uncle told her that her grandmother, Janina Maria, was a Jewish convert to Christianity who had married a member of Poland's gentry. Although Ornat was brought up as a Catholic, she values the Jewish dimension of her identity. "People in Poland have begun to realize that Jews were an integral part of Polish society. You can't consider Polish culture without its Jewish counterpart."

Her husband, a lawyer, has Jewish roots, too. "This is the Polish story. Polish and Jewish history are one." During the mid-1980s, he discovered that his great-great grandmother had converted to Christianity in the 19th century. He does not have an affinity with Judaism, but he and his wife observe Jewish holidays at Klezmer Hois. As he said, "I'm Polish with a Jewish identity."

Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund Performance
Annualized Compounded Return
Income distribution to investors is on the 15th of every month
The Fund is RRSP and RRIF eligible and is audited by KPMG

You have probably heard about the success that investors in the Romspen Mortgage Investment Fund (RMIF) have had. Like consistent annual returns, even in 2008 when so many investments lost money. The RMIF has never failed to pay investors their monthly income.

Let's face it, stock market investments can be risky and volatile. For many people it makes sense to include a fixed income component like the RMIF, Canada's largest private mortgage fund. Interested in a smooth, steady yield? Learn all about it and meet our management team at our next monthly investor seminar. Financial advisors are welcome.

Next Seminar Wednesday, October 14 @ 6:00 p.m.

Ethnic press house loses funding from OAC

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Guernica Editions, a small, local publishing house, has been denied funding from the Ontario Arts Council block grant program.

Though serving the Italian community primarily – Guernica publishes many translations of Italian books along with original English works by Italo-Canadian authors – the publication also is home to a variety of ethnic wordsmiths, including a smattering of Jewish, award-winning authors and poets who are none-too-pleased by the provincial agency's decision to reject this year's grant application.

Antonio D'Alfonso

The council's Guernica grant slid from approximately $11,000 to $8,000 over the last four years. Yet even with it, the small press was always on a shoestring budget, according to its publisher, Antonio D'Alfonso.

"This just puts a financial strain on us," he said. "This isn't a money-making job. Everyone who works with us works for peanuts."

Karen Shenfeld, a Toronto poet and volunteer with the organization, told The CJN that over the past five years, it has published five Jewish woman poets: herself, Elana Wollf, Malca Litovitz, Merle Nudelman and Ruth Panofsky.

"Three of us have won the Canadian Jewish Book Award for Poetry. This fall, Guernica Editions had also intended to publish another fine young Jewish woman poet, Baila Ellenbogen, in its First Poets Series," she said, adding that Guernica is "deeply committed to publishing poetry that is not only written by poets who happen to be Jewish… but poetry that arises from, reflects and enhances Jewish culture and tradition. Which is why the loss of this press would be tragic for the Canadian Jewish literature."

Though not lost yet – the small press still receives grant money from the Canadian Council for the Arts – Guernica is floundering financially, D'Alfonso said.

A native Montrealer, D'Alfonso had run Guernica out of his hometown – and with help from his own chequebook – publishing nearly 500 books over 25 years before funding opportunities dried up in Quebec and he moved the enterprise to Toronto about five years ago, in part to take advantage of the Ontario Arts Council (OAC) grants program.

He accused the council of systematically attempting to stifle the promotion of multiculturalism in the province in favour of publications that are more "commercial" and profit-minded.

"Are books like shoes, ham or potatoes? We are a literary press. We produce books about ethnic culture, cultural pluralism. This is a slow process. When we started, 'multicultural' barely existed as a term. Guernica was one of the first presses to deal with such issues," D'Alfonso said. "In Quebec and elsewhere in the world, Guernica is still known as the press to study these issues. It is only in English Canada, where these issues are not dealt with in a very serious manner, that we seem to hit a wall."

The council feels otherwise.

At issue for OAC advisory panel members who analyzed Guernica's 2009 grant application – five "publishing industry representatives [and] experts in the field," according to the council, the identities of whom could not be revealed to D'Alfonso or his editors, according to council internal policy – is Guernica's viability as a press.

John Brotman and John Degen, the OAC's executive director and literature officer respectively, said Guernica had failed to demonstrate any moves toward securing other revenue streams over the last few years and were concerned about it stagnating that way.

In an interview earlier this month, both Brotman and Degen said they applauded the quality of the work Guernica put out, but referenced assessments by four different advisory panels since 2006 that noted Guernica's diminishing "viability and impact."

When asked to expand on this year's judgment and cite specifics on how Guernica was not viable and did not make a significant impact on Ontarians, the OAC referred to the panel's assessment about D'Alfonso's lack of distribution channels, exposure, and particularly Guernica's perceived lack of fiscal responsibility.

D'Alfonso scoffed at this and said, on the subject of exposure and promotion of his product, that his books are distributed by the University of Toronto Press and can be found at mainstream bookstores such as Chapters and Indigo, as well as in libraries around the province.

"Our books are everywhere. I am not interested in playing the U.S. game of printing 50,000 copies, invading the market for two weeks and then have 49,999 copies returned," he said. "Cultural products sell slowly. This is not… Armani shoes."

When asked how the OAC can conclude what it did about Guernica's exposure to the public in light of D'Alfonso's claims of widespread distribution, Brotman answered: "It's not about the OAC doing the assessment. I would not know how to answer this question. Which is why we use panels of advisers who are drawn from the industry itself. In the last four years alone, there have been 20 experts [who have looked at Guernica], so if they have been saying that they have questions, issues and concerns about the public viability and availability of the publisher, we have to listen to them. It's not about whether I like his books or not."

Degen expanded on this, saying that the OAC panels base their assessments solely on information provided by the applicant and as such the panels need to be "convinced not just by the claims of the publisher, but by the numbers backing up those claims."

Degen said the OAC had offered to "gladly" work with D'Alfonso to suggest ways to improve his operations and become a better candidate for a grant by the program's March 2010 deadline.

D'Alfonso said he would not reapply for the OAC grant in 2010, citing mistrust and hopelessness at any chance of securing funds again from an organization that he believes has branded him a "cultural agitator."

In August, Degen said he met with two of Guernica's editors – Elana Wollf, a Jewish award-winning poet in her own right, and Julie Roorda – and discussed Guernica's future and ways to move forward. D'Alfonso did not attend.

According to Roorda, the meeting with Degen was "a little frustrating" because the editors were met with "generalizations" instead of details about why the panels scored them so low.

Roorda said since the meeting, Guernica has hired a webmaster to "push forward with our online tools" to show they are more serious about becoming increasingly active on a marketing side, but that she's unsure if this will be enough.

She said the editors would like to "talk some more" with D'Alfonso before ruling out reapplying for the OAC grant in 2010.

In the meantime, D'Alfonso said he's considering returning his base of operations to Montreal out of frustration and hopes he can publish the books he had planned to this year.

Brotman had a last word of caution for Guernica and publications in the same financial straits seeking an OAC grant.

"We should never be considered the sole source of revenue for any of these organizations. If [a publisher] is so dependent on our grant that they will go in or out of business whether they get the $8,000 from us, that, in a way, is a reflection of their viability. They should have other sources of income, and I don't just mean public funding."

Intern gets a taste of life at Queen's Park

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The name Aviva Levy isn't synonymous with provincial power politics, but the 22-year-old Torontonian will nevertheless be rubbing shoulders with the powers-that-be at Queen's Park for the better part of the next year.

Levy – who graduated from McGill University this summer with BA in Canadian studies and sociology – was recently one of 10 Canadian young people selected for this year's Ontario Legislature Internship Program (OLIP).

OLIP provides MPP backbenchers with assistants and provides interns with exposure to the daily inner workings of the Legislature. It also gives them the opportunity to "supplement their university training through regular academic discussions and by writing an academic paper on a topic of their choice."

Aviva Levy

Levy, the 10-month-long program's sole Jewish intern this year, told The CJN that being part of OLIP is a personal thrill.

"Working at Queen's Park is like a poli-sci nerd convention," she laughed, referring to the way she and her nine OLIP colleagues have marvelled at their good fortune ever since starting the program last month.

And to all those friends and acquaintances who've told her that politics is boring and unimportant, her message to her peers is simple, "You should care [about provincial politics], because it directly affects you."

She said she's been a political junkie ever since she was a child. It's little wonder, considering her mother, Sylvia Bashevkin, is a renowned author and professor of political science at the University of Toronto and a former president of the Canadian Political Science Association.

"My mom always cautioned me about partisan politics," Levy said. "She effects change through academia in her courses on women and politics. I hope to do the same, outside academia."

Levy said her ultimate aim is to work in Ontario's civil service, though she's unsure which ministry suits her best.

"I'm learning by trial and error which ministry I'd like to work for," she said, adding that once she's completed the 10-month OLIP program, she'll be enrolling in political science graduate studies at U of T.

While at McGill, Levy was a founding member of the Political Issues Club. She also studied at the University of Haifa in Israel and has worked for both the Ontario Ministry of Government Services and the Ministry of Transportation in the summers of 2007 and 2009, respectively. Additionally, she worked for Elections Ontario in the last provincial election and has been an active member of the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee since 2006.

A non-partisan organization, OLIP was established in 1975 and is administered by the Canadian Political Science Association. It's supported by a financial grant from the Legislative Assembly of Ontario.

University graduates from across Canada can apply for the program, and Levy encourages anyone interested in pursuing a career in politics to do so.

"Recent grads should all apply," she said. "The OLIP stipend isn't taxed and we get free travel to other legislatures… and at the end of the program we go to the U.K. to meet interns."

Visionary donors honoured for bringing Sherman Campus to life

Prosserman JCC opens for business

By Daniel Horowitz

A new era in Toronto Jewish communal life was ushered in on September 16 with the opening celebration of the first phase of Sherman Campus. The event, held in the Tamari Family Hall, part of the enhanced Lipa Green Centre for Jewish Community Services, marked the official opening of the Prosserman JCC at the new Donald Gales Family Pavilion as well as the expanded Lipa Green Centre.

Toronto Mayor David Miller and Vaughan MPP Greg Sorbara joined donors to Sherman Campus, who were honoured for their vision, generosity and for playing a pivotal role in bringing the beautiful 27-acre site on Bathurst, north of Sheppard, to life.

The new facility will be home to Prosserman JCC programs, which include fitness facilities, programs for seniors, the David & Esther Freiman Childhood Education Centre, the Koffler Centre of the Arts, family programming and a host of cultural and social activities.

The $400 million Tomorrow Campaign is building three centres of Jewish life that will serve all residents of the Greater Toronto Area. Chaired by Gerry Schwartz and Larry Tanenbaum, the project is the largest non-profit infrastructure development in Canada. The groundbreaking of Sherman Campus took place in October, 2007. The groundbreaking of the 50-acre Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan took place in May, 2005. Downtown, the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre completed its renovation in November 2004 while The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life opened in February, 2004.

Judge warns families about using family court

Parents leave angrier than they were in the beginning

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If Harvey Brownstone, a judge with the Ontario Court of Justice, has one message for divorcing parents, it's that family court is bad for families.

Harvey Brownstone

Speaking at last week's annual general meeting of Jewish Family & Child, Brownstone, who presides over family court, said that it should be a couple's last resort.

"Courts are designed to solve legal problems, but most people's problems are interpersonal. When parents fight in court, they leave angrier than they were in the beginning. There is no winner in family court, there is only degrees of losing," he said.

Brownstone, who recently wrote Tug of War: A Judge's Verdict on Separation, Custody Battles, and the Bitter Realities of Family Court, said that family court is about the personalities of the parties involved, not about the facts of the case.

"After 14 years on the job, I cannot believe that parents [could] hate each other so much that they would give all that power to a judge. They need to love their children more than they hate each other.

"Family courts are clogged with cases [that have parents fighting so long] the files are closed only because their children turn 18."

Children are the real victims in family court, he said, because they're caught in the middle of a tug of war. "Parents have to understand the impact of their behaviour on their children.

"Separation or divorce is not necessarily bad for children, it is the conflict that is bad. [When] children witness fighting, it is a form of child abuse, and they should be shielded from this behaviour," he added.

"The most challenging cases are those in which the children are at risk of emotional harm. If the only way to make peace is for us to put them in a neutral place such as foster care, then we'll do it."

Couples make a "huge" mistake by coming to family court without a lawyer, Brownstone said. "Lawyers are expensive, and about 70 per cent of people come without them. They are in for a shock, though, because [most] people don't know what family courts do.

"There are a lot of rules of evidence, and the system is not designed to be navigated without legal help. People have to prove what they're saying, and they need lawyers to prove the evidence. What actually happened does not matter. [What matters] is what you can prove happened. It is not good enough to tell the judge your side of the story."

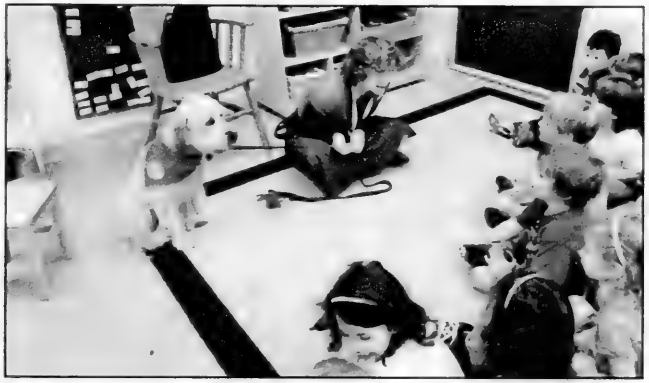
Family courts are different than other courts, he said, "because at family courts, people have to keep dealing with each other. Parents have a sacred opportunity to put their emotional baggage behind."

He wrote his book, he said, "because when couples break up they don't know where to turn for help. They need counselling and legal advice to learn about their rights and obligations."

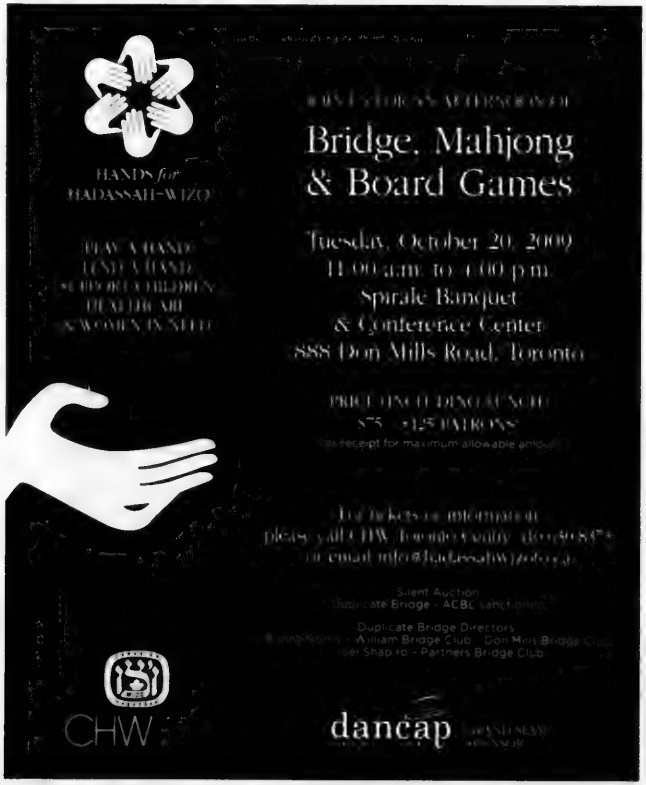
He said Tug of War is the first book written by a judge for the public. "I wrote it because I am convinced that judges should be public educators, not just adjudicators. By the time [people come to see us in court], it is too late to prevent the carnage. If we can get information out to parents, maybe they can make better use of the system."

Royalties from the book are earmarked for the Children's Wish Foundation – although $10 from each book sold at the meeting went to JF&CS – because "parents of ill children would do anything to have them [healthy.] The others should be grateful for their healthy children."

Also at the meeting, presentations were made in memory of JF&CS social worker Elinor Gertner, who died in July. The outgoing JF&CS president is Richard Orzy, and the incoming president is Sharon Shore.



A STUDENT'S BEST FRIEND: Shaynee (the Wheaten Terrier) and Michelle Pincus are weekly volunteers at the Miles Nadal JCC Nursery School. They read to the children and give them hands on opportunities to learn appropriate interactions with animals.

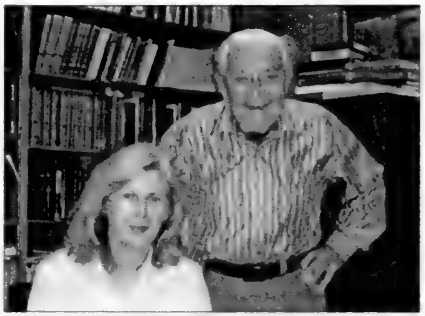


German minister joins Rabbi Schild at book launch

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Erwin Schild has been a regular visitor to Germany for the past 27 years, speaking to Christian groups about Jewish theology and his personal history following an initial invitation in 1982.

Last month, Rev. Regina Doffer, a Protestant minister from Cologne-Junkersdorf, travelled to Toronto for the launch of the rabbi's third book, And Miles to go Before I Sleep, which follows a 1992 collection of sermons and a 2001 memoir.



Rev. Regina Doffer and Rabbi Erwin Schild

Rev. Doffer has heard the 89-year-old rabbi emeritus of Adath Israel Congregation lecture at her church several times since she first heard him in 1988.

Rabbi Schild's new book – a compilation of sermons, eulogies and other writings – includes two sermons he gave as a "Sermon to the City" in Cologne, where he was born 89 years ago. In one, the rabbi, who was imprisoned briefly in Dachau in 1938, refers to himself as a "peculiar amalgam, a Canadian rabbi who was born here in Germany, who was banished, his parents, kin and friends murdered, yet he seeks understanding, not retribution, dialogue, not hate."

The 334-page book, published by Adath Israel in co-operation with publisher Malcolm Lester, includes reflections on life, God, aging, prayer and Jewish history, as well as an index of subjects at the back of the book. A brief postscript describes the added perspective the rabbi gained after a fall on the ice last winter and his subsequent recovery from a broken hip and shoulder.

Rev. Doffer – the 51-year-old spiritual leader of Cologne's Dietrich Bonhöfer Church, a 2,600-member congregation – recalls being inspired by one of the rabbi's talks in particular, when he spoke for about 20 minutes without consulting any notes. After that, she said, "I always wanted to preach like him."

The reverend, like Rabbi Schild, is German-born, and shares his interest in interfaith dialogue, for which he has received the Order of Canada and a similar honour from the German government.

Following Rev. Doffer's university studies in Talmud, midrash, history, literature, and theology in Bonn and later Heidelberg and Berlin, she requested placement in a church where Jewish-Christian dialogue "wasn't unknown," she said.

Recently, she has started to become involved in Muslim-Christian interfaith efforts as well. "We have a lot to do," she said, referring in part to the issue of Holocaust denial within the Muslim community.

In addition to her studies in Germany, she also took courses at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem in the early 1980s. With a background in biblical Hebrew, she studied in Hebrew following a six-week ulpan.

The reverend has always tried to teach her congregation that Judaism and Christianity share common roots and common ground, she said. It's not uncommon, she added, for German Christians to believe that references to "Israel" in their psalms refer to the church, not to a people that still exists.

She said there is anti-Semitism in Germany, but ignorance is much more common.

On the other hand, noted Rabbi Schild, Jewish stereotypes still exist in Germany. If he were walking with the Chabad rabbi who is based in Cologne, local passersby would probably think they were seeing a Jew and a non-Jew, he said.

Rev. Doffer traces her interest in Judaism to a minister in her home congregation, about an hour outside of Frankfurt, who taught her when she was about 16 that Jesus was a Jew.

Her father, who owned a roofing company, accepted her interests, as did her mother, who objected to the Israel study component only out of fear for her safety when Israel invaded Lebanon, the reverend recalls.

She has been back to Israel twice, and plans to take a group of congregants there next year.

Because of Cologne's Jewish population of about 5,000 people – including many from the former Soviet Union – and its few, small congregations, there is little in the way of Jewish life to share, Rev. Doffer said. Even in Berlin, with a larger Jewish community and more – although still limited access to kosher food, "you won't find a [large] synagogue like [Adath Israel]."

Her congregation was "really lucky to have [Rabbi Schild] in our community," she said, adding that his visits have provided opportunities for learning and discussion.

In Jewish critiques, Goldstone disappears from his own report

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

Looking for Justice Richard Goldstone? You're not likely to find him in critiques of his report.

Analysis

The retired South Africa judge who headed the UN-mandated fact-finding inquiry into last winter's Gaza war tends to get lost in the flurry of reactions from Israel and Jewish groups excoriating his report for accusing Israel of war crimes and possibly crimes against humanity.

Goldstone's absence appears to be a function of his – perhaps former – celebrity in the Jewish world.

He was known not too long ago as that rarity: an actively pro-Israel, Jewishly involved figure who also is a hero of the human rights community. He was the judge who presided over the funeral of apartheid, who administered justice for the victims of the signal bloodshedding of the 1990s, in Yugoslavia and in Rwanda.

"That makes it worse," said Abraham Foxman, the Anti-Defamation League's national director, upon being reminded of Goldstone's status as a trustee of the Hebrew University in Jerusalem and a president emeritus of World ORT, the Jewish organization that is a leader in vocational training and education.

Israeli and Jewish communal leaders – most speaking off the record – speculate that Goldstone was chosen because of his Jewish status and is being used as a prop. They note that Mary Robinson, the one-time UN human rights commissioner and target of many pro-Israel groups, actually turned down the job because she regarded the UN Human Rights Council resolution mandating the mission as overly political.

"The choice of Goldstone was seen as an insurance policy against charges of anti-Semitism," Gerald Steinberg, who directs NGO Monitor (and writes a monthly column for The CJN), wrote in his initial analysis of the report.

Goldstone seems determined not to disappear. He took his case directly to Israelis with an opinion piece last week in the Jerusalem Post, in which he slammed Israel especially for refusing to deal with the fact finders.

"The responses from the government of Israel to the UN Fact-Finding Mission on Gaza have been deeply disappointing," he wrote. "The mission's mandate enabled Israel to bring its concerns and facts relating to Operation Cast Lead publicly before a UN inquiry. It could have been used by Israel to encourage the UN and especially the Human Rights Council to move in a new direction beneficial to the interests of Israel."

Steinberg is one of the few Jewish organizational figures who has taken direct aim at Goldstone, citing Goldstone's previous role as a board member of Human Rights Watch, an organization that frequently has leveled accusations against Israel regarding its conduct during battles in Gaza and Lebanon.

Goldstone told the Forward newspaper that his religion had no role in his selection, but acknowledged taking the job in part because of his relationship with Israel.

"I was driven particularly because I thought the outcome might, in a small way, assist the peace process," he told the weekly.

Judge Richard Goldstone

An outraged statement from the American Israel Public Affairs Committee dropped Goldstone's name entirely from its headline, which describes a "biased UN report." The text refers to the "Goldstone Report" inside quotation marks.

Likewise, the ADL statement refers only to the Goldstone Report, and does not mention his first name, Richard, or his occupation, judge. He goes similarly uncited in the barrage of statements from pro-Israel congressional stalwarts, including U.S. Reps. Gary Ackerman (D-N.Y.), Eliot Engel (D-N.Y.), Shelley Berkley (D-Nev.) and Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (R-Fla.).

The American Jewish Committee's comment mentioned Goldstone only as an afterthought – "headed by South African Judge Richard Goldstone" – in the last paragraph of its four-paragraph statement. The cursory mention was all the more remarkable because it came in the middle of a screed against a panel member who had signed an anti-Israel letter prior to being appointed.

A spokesperson for World ORT protested that Goldstone was "history" – he served as president of the organization from 1996 to 2003 – and did not follow up on JTA's request to make available officials for comment. A Hebrew University spokesperson said the institution doesn't comment on its trustees.

Goldstone's daughter, Nicole, who once lived in Israel, described her father to Israel Army Radio as a Zionist who "loves Israel." Ha'aretz uncovered a lecture Golstone delivered in Jerusalem in 2000 to Yakar: Center for Tradition and Creativity, at which Aharon Barak, then Israel's chief justice, described Goldstone as a friend with "very deep ties to Israel." Goldstone's topic was the role of the Holocaust in shaping international law.

Israel refused to co-operate with the commission, saying its mandate was one-sided, although Goldstone took steps to redress the imbalance through his insistence on investigating alleged war crimes committed by the Hamas overlords in the Gaza Strip.

Israeli spokespeople turned down multiple requests for interviews about Goldstone the man, as opposed to the report. But the tensions between the revulsion Israel maintains for a body, the UN Human Rights Council, and the regard it had for the man were evident in an exchange of letters between Goldstone and Aharon Leshno Yaar, Israel's ambassador to UN bodies in Geneva.

"Israel's decision should not be interpreted in any way as an aspersion on your own integrity or commitment to impartiality," Yaar wrote in one letter. "To the contrary, your involvement prompted Israel to give closer and more considered thought to its response to this initiative and increases our regret that it is one we cannot co-operate with or support."

Elsewhere in the letter, Yaar notes Goldstone's "high regard" among Israelis.

Marc Stern, the acting co-director of the American Jewish Congress, says the bias Goldstone evinces in the report is not against Israel but for international law within the constraints of human rights legislation. Goldstone, he says, was unlikely – precisely because of his institutional background – to consider the laws of war.

"There's no analysis of what Israel was trying to do," said Stern, who emphasized that the report nonetheless raises serious questions about the treatment of detainees and the shooting of civilians bearing white flags. Under the laws of war, "The fact that you're fighting in a civilian area ought to allow you a greater margin to kill civilians than in a battlefield."

Let's improve our business ethics in 5770

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

From an ethical perspective, this past year has not been a very good one. There has been a seemingly endless stream of scandals involving money laundering, tax evasion, Ponzi schemes, immigration fraud, and trading in human organs involving "rabbis," businesspeople and community "leaders." Even a former prime minister of Israel stands accused of serious charges of corruption. As they say, there's nothing new under the sun, and, unfortunately, failings in money matters is not a new problem.

The Talmud notes that along with sexual immorality and gossip, this is one of the areas where we all fail to one degree or another. It's not by chance that so many of the al chets recited on Yom Kippur relate to the monetary realm. Yet despite the fact that dishonesty will never be eradicated, we're bidden to do our best nonetheless, just as we continue to fight poverty despite the biblical claim that "the poor will never cease to exist in the land."

Yet there do appear to be some unique features to our current mess. With the creation of the State of Israel, our ultimate mission to be a light unto the nations is bound up in our exemplary moral leadership. Jews around the world today are fully integrated members of society, thereby magnifying our misdeeds. And never before have Jewish people had the wealth we currently possess, which affords more opportunity for corruption.

Yet, ironically, at the same time, never before has living a Jewish life been so expensive. In pre-modern life, the basic needs of a Jewish community – schooling, shuls, mikvaot – were paid for by the community. As we have moved to a "user fee" model for essential Jewish services, only those at the very top of the income pole can both optimally fulfil the mitzvah to be "fruitful and multiply" and live an intense Jewish life. While this is no excuse for dishonest activity, the fact remains that given the stress on many, corners will often be cut.

With the increase in high-profile cases, there has, tragically, come a greater "acceptance" of these misdeeds. While many bemoan this depressing situation, little seems to be done. There's no easier way to make living a meaningful Jewish life more unappealing than by exposing someone to Jews involved in less-than-exemplary behaviour.

In a move that is revealingly tragic, yet right on the mark, the Rabbinical Council of America has asked rabbis to devote one sermon on Rosh Hashanah to the topic of honesty in our business dealings. Taxes must be paid, all items must be declared at the border, no distinction in moral integrity is allowed due to race or religion. While no one is naively suggesting that a speech from the pulpit will have an immediate or noticeable impact, by making this a priority item, over time, changes will occur. After all, only after years of focusing on the need for intensive Jewish day school education has it become the norm for many (a situation that is threatened by the increasingly high cost of such an education).

Speaking of said education, I am unaware of any Jewish school worldwide that devotes even one entire course to what we might call "Money, Morality and the Modern Marketplace." Perhaps instead of focusing on shofar, apples and honey, waiving a lulav or eating matzah (things we teach year in and year out), rabbis and educators alike should spend more time teaching the laws of tzedakah, advertising, competition, pricing and the like.

This is the best preparation we can do for Yom Kippur, the day our fate is sealed, allowing us to answer in the affirmative God's first question to man on the ultimate Day of Judgment, "Were your monetary dealings conducted faithfully?"

York has problems, but not pogroms

Guest Voice

By ERIC LAWEE and MARTIN LOCKSHIN

We are writing to express our dismay at remarks made by Minister of Citizenship, Immigration and Multiculturalism Jason Kenney on Sept. 13 about anti-Semitism at York University.

Allow us to clarify at the outset that we are most grateful for the sincere concern that he and so many other members of the government have shown about anti-Semitism in Canada. In general, we appreciate his unstinting personal support and his government's strong and consistent support for the State of Israel and the Jewish community.

Given that, we were taken aback when he referred to "York University, where we saw, for example, what is reminiscent of the ancient pogroms directed at the Jewish student community organizations."

We are professors of Jewish studies at York. We teach our students about the history of pogroms – massacres of Jews that led to the death of many members of our people.

We work at York. We and a large number of other Jewish men walk around campus every day wearing kippot and do so without fear. Another 4,000 other Jews, more or less, also walk around campus every day in total freedom. They benefit from a wide range of Jewish activities – a kosher restaurant on campus, rich Jewish student activity life, a wide array of top-level Jewish studies courses, student and faculty exchanges with leading Israeli universities – all encouraged and supported by the president of York and his administration, as well as deans, associate deans, department chairs and support staff.

It's out of line to compare the situation here – and even the worst of some of the regrettable events that have occurred on campus – to a pogrom.

The strongest reason that we find the comparison offensive is not because of the insult to York, but because it trivializes the word "pogrom."

Our grandparents and great-grandparents were witnesses to the horrors of pogroms in eastern Europe. Pogroms didn't involve verbal intimidation of Jews. They involved the rape, pillage and murder of Jews. Our grandparents and great-grandparents fled to Canada to escape these murderous pogroms around 100 years ago. Their descendants here at York and in other places in Canada have a life of freedom that our grandparents never dreamed of. It's a grave insult to those Jews who were victims of eastern European pogroms to say that their suffering was akin to the problems of Jewish students at York.

Yes, there are problems at York, as there are at every university.

Each university is unique. It's likely that the level of conflict at York is above average, and we are both on record as having deplored some of the genuinely troubling and unacceptable events that have occurred on campus in recent years, and especially in recent months, which presumably spurred his remarks and well-intentioned concern.

There is a small but vocal and well-organized gang of anti-Israel extremists at York who succeed from time to time in making life unpleasant. One of their favourite tools is outlandish hyperbole – using totally inappropriate and inaccurate language to criticize Israel, for example when they use the calumny of calling Israel an apartheid state.

They are part of a larger international movement that seeks to demonize, uniquely, the Jewish state, reflecting what, in his moving speech last February at the Inaugural Conference of the Inter-Parliamentary Commission for Combating Anti-Semitism, Kenney called "the anti-Semitism predicated on the notion that the Jews alone have no right to a homeland."

We feel that the way to counter the efforts of these extremists is by telling the truth about Israel and exposing the stupidity of their accusations.

We invite the minister to come to York to see the rich Jewish life here. We can also discuss the very real problems on campus and exchange ideas for solutions. But we ask him and others to refrain from using inappropriate language that's neither accurate nor helpful in achieving the aims we share for informed and civil debate at York and campuses across Canada.

Prof. Eric Lawee is acting director of the Israel and Golda Koschitzky Centre for Jewish Studies at York University. Prof. Martin Lockshin is the centre's former director.

Media puts focus on Iranian threat

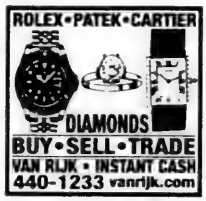
According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

A recent upsurge of anti-Israel activity from a number of radical quarters – Israel boycott movements from union and certain church groups; "Israeli Apartheid Week" on campuses; the protest over the Toronto International Film Festival's spotlight on Tel Aviv; the Goldstone Commission Report on the Gaza war, etc. has been covered to one degree or another by the media. This might lead one to assume that journalists have been preoccupied with Israel to the exclusion of more pressing international stories.

In fact, a survey of foreign affairs coverage reveals that the Canadian, along with American, media have devoted substantially more attention in the past few months to Pakistan and Afghanistan (where Canadian and U.S. troops are engaged in combat) and Iran than to Israel.

While Israel is frequently mentioned in the same story or commentary concerning Iran, especially the threats emanating from President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, the principle focus of this coverage has been on the depredations of Tehran's ruling clique.



Iran's nuclear and ballistic missile programs are threats not only to Israel but also the Sunni-dominant Arab Gulf states that Iran arguably seeks to intimidate and dominate. But above all else, Tehran's repeated, feverish threats mark the Jewish state as the Number 1 target, thereby giving Israel the only UN-member state threatened with extinction by another United Nations member – ample justification to act in self-defence.

The National Post put all this in perspective in its Sept. 22 editorial "The Iranian threat."

The Post wrote: "President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad calls for the Jewish state to be 'wiped off the map' almost weekly, it seems – along with repeated statements denying the historical reality of the Holocaust. Former president Hashemi Rafsanjani, a supposed moderate, said in 2001 that the day would eventually come when Israel's enemies had a bomb and would use it to destroy the Jewish state. Ayatollah Khomeini called Israel's destruction 'a sacred duty for every true Muslim.'

"On and on it goes: The annihilation of Israel is the single recurring theme of Iranian public life."

The Post concluded that while Israel is right to wait some months to give U.S.-led talks with Iran a chance, should those talks fail to lead Iran to curtail its nuclear program, Israel could not be faulted for taking Iran at its word and acting accordingly.

On the issue of those upcoming talks, the Washington Post's David Ignatius ("Reading Iran by the Letter," Sept. 20) warned that they are likely doomed from the outset: "The revolutionary zealotry of Ahmadinejad and his allies is among the obstacles the Obama administration faces as it prepares for Oct. 1 talks with the Islamic republic. As Ahmadinejad's letters [to America] make clear, he doesn't want a seat at the negotiating table with the great powers; he wants to overturn that table.

"Ahmadinejad defies not only the United States, but the entire system of international relations that was created in 1945 at the end of World War II."

American officials have been recently signalling that President Barack Obama himself doesn't hold out much hope for these talks, even though he's committed to giving them a try.

Ignatius noted that "Obama is subtly turning up the pressure on Tehran, even as he invites dialogue. That's the importance of [the Sept. 17] announcement that the United States is shelving its plans for missile defence sites in Poland and the Czech Republic. Officials may deny there's any quid pro quo – any reciprocal promise of Soviet support for sanctions against Iran if negotiations fail. But the Iranians will worry, just the same.

"That's hardball negotiating: Make them sweat in Tehran. Make them worry that unless they start acting like a nation, they will face growing isolation, economic pressure and internal unrest. The administration's insistence that its alternative missile defence plan will actually be more effective against Iran adds to the squeeze on Tehran."

Immigrant language program celebrates 20 years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Roslynne Greenberg is one of the first names many immigrants hear before they even arrive in Canada.

As manager of the JIAS Toronto's LINC (language instruction for newcomers to Canada) program, Greenberg said she receives e-mails from people in such places as China, Philippines and South Korea asking her about the school.

"One morning, I was surprised to meet an Iranian student who came in looking for 'Roslynne.' He knew about the school and its reputation," she said.

Last week, Greenberg, who started as a teacher when the program was a pilot project, helped celebrate LINC's 20th anniversary at a reunion that attracted about 200 guests.

"The school has been a success from the beginning. When [the wave] of immigrants began coming from the former Soviet Union in 1989, we wanted to help them integrate in the community, so we developed a program to teach English and Judaica," she said.

"Within a year, the pilot expanded to include three classes and we moved [to our current location at 15 Hove St.] within the year. We now have five locations – the newest is at 1520 Steeles Ave. W. – that offer full and part-time classes. There are 22 LINC classes, and 12 are in partnership with the Toronto District School Board."

Some 41 toddlers are cared for in the school's "child mind" while the parents are in class, she said.

At LINC's 20th anniversary celebration

"Their teachers know Hebrew, Russian or Spanish, so when the kids come in, they feel at home. They speak their first language, but they also learn English while they're here."

As a pilot project, the school was for Jewish students, but now it is funded through Citizenship and Immigration Canada, so it's multicultural, Greenberg said.

Sherry Kaufman, a teacher there for nine years, noted that LINC is an immersion school. "We only speak English. Students come in at level '0' and we speak to them with our hands and our bodies. We have continuous intake, so students start whenever they're ready and finish when they're finished."

But it's more than a place to learn English, Kaufman said.

"The students become friends, and they become part of the JIAS family. We bring in speakers, we go on [day] trips, and we help them network for jobs. We do what we can to help them integrate into Canadian society."

Ilana Chor, who started at LINC after she arrived from Ukraine about three years ago, said that the school helped her psychologically and socially.

"I learned English, I made friends, and now I am licensed to work as an ultrasound technologist. I have reinvented myself," said the mother of three.

Joanna Sasson Morrison, co-ordinator of community development services at JIAS, said the number of people who were interested in attending the reunion, "speaks of the impact of the school. We started out by talking to one person, who spoke to another, who spoke to another. Before we knew it, all these people were interested, and many wanted to help out with the reunion. I hear over and over again that JIAS helped them when they arrived, and now they want to give back."

Rabbi Ya'acov Engel with students.

Public school boys celebrate first siyum

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Finishing a tractate of Talmud isn't easy for anyone, let alone for a group of 18 public school boys with virtually no Jewish educational background.

But on Sept. 9, Daniel Schafer and his friends enjoyed their first siyum, a party celebrating the completion of a unit of Torah study.

"It was really difficult, especially since we were starting from scratch and had to learn so much basic stuff in Judaism, but it was so rewarding to finally finish," said Schafer, a Grade 11 student at Langstaff Secondary School.

The boys wanted a real challenge to test themselves and their beliefs in Judaism.

But anyone who has ever studied Talmud, the oral law, knows how detailed and difficult it can be.

After attending some basic "Ask the Rabbi" classes at the Jewish Centre for Learning and Living – now known as the Thornhill Woods Shul – Daniel, 16, and Jonathan Fucchansky, 17, wanted deeper answers to their questions.

So Rabbi Ya'acov Engel, with whom they had been learning, decided to study with them in more detail at the Richmond Hill Country Shul.

The boys learned the section of Talmud that deals mostly with the reading of Megillat Esther, because it's easy to understand and short.

It took them more than two years to complete.

"It was awesome!" Schafer said.

"I didn't understand any of it until Rabbi Engel explained it, but after hearing it, it's what I want to learn about Judaism: reasons for laws, customs and traditions."

Fucchansky agreed.

"Talmud study is a true testament to how much one really knows about Judaism. All the answers to questions I've ever had are all in there."

Schafer's mom, Bobbi Greenberg, initiated the boys' learning.

Following her son's bar mitzvah nearly four years ago, Greenberg encouraged Schafer to find out more about his roots. Greenberg believes that, regardless of one's level of observance, everyone should explore Judaism and become educated.

"I didn't know they'd be learning such deep material, but they're really enjoying it," she said. "I'm so proud of them."

More amazing, Greenberg said, is how Schafer and Fucchansky encouraged their Langstaff friends to learn, too.

"One or two know some Hebrew, and the rest had never even gone to Sunday school. It's one thing for boys in Jewish day school to learn Talmud, or even if they had some previous background, but for a group of public high school boys? That's unheard of."

Schafer said the learning was so inspiring that he felt obligated to share it with his peers.

"I didn't want to keep it to myself. Everyone owes it to themselves to at least discover and question before throwing it all away."

Schafer and Fucchansky found it a bit difficult to get their friends to attend, but they figured that if could get them to come out just once, the food, jokes and great learning would bring them back.

"It worked, didn't it?" Fucchansky said jokingly. "It's also the atmosphere. The [Country Shul] is literally a [private] home, so it's comfortable."

Perhaps due to the boys' commitment and interest, the parents of all 18 embraced their experience.

"The kids wouldn't be here if the parents didn't allow them to be, which, sadly, there are parents of other boys who didn't allow their kids ever to come," Greenberg said.

Fucchansky also noted how some of his friend's parents were turned off by the idea of their kids learning religiously. "It's not about being religious, but discovering where one's place in Judaism is," he said.

Schafer and Fucchansky said Rabbi Engel taught them to question everything.

"People are often too scared to ask questions or fear they won't get satisfactory answers. I teach from the beginning that any question is a good question. It's the only way to learn and grow," Rabbi Engel said.

Schafer said the many laws of daily conduct with others are the most important things he's learned over the past two years, and they've helped him become a gentler, more loving person.

The boys are continuing their studies with the tractate dealing with blessings.

Woman finds daughter's birth mom in Guatemala

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

In 2007, Adrienne Rosen set off to Guatemala in search of her adopted daughter Alana's birth mother.

Not only did she find the mother, but she founded a non-profit organization to benefit La Union, the birth mother's village, where the poverty is so extreme most children can't afford to go to school.

Adrienne Rosen, left is seen with Marcelina Cardona, Rosen's adopted daughter's birth mother, outside the elementary school in La Union, a small town in northern Guatemala.

The story begins well before 2007. Rosen notes that her daughter had an "unremarkable Jewish upbringing." She attended the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School, the Toronto Heschel School and Camp Gesher, but "she had always felt different from people in her family and the greater Jewish community."

That point was brought home to her when she was at camp one summer and another camper told her she couldn't be Jewish because she was "brown," Rosen recalls.

"The camp director, a Yemenite Jew, was brown himself. He used this as a time to teach kids at camp about racism and about Jewish history and about how many different places Jewish people come from."

In her early teens, her adoptive daughter went through a difficult emotional period typical of many adolescent girls, but her angst was exacerbated by issues related to her adoption, explains Rosen. These children frequently confront issues of "loss and abandonment."

"I had a hunch that my daughter needed to meet her birth mother and ask her the essential question in every adopted child's life: 'Why did my mother give me away?'"

Rosen went to Guatemala with Tim Wilson, a neighbour who had spent some time there. They had the mother's name, her city of origin and her national identity number. "My daughter asked for nothing, but a picture of her biological mother," remembers Rosen. "She thought I was crazy to make the trip."

Their search began with a four-hour drive north near the Mexican border.

Five hours later, they located the family. "When I knocked on the door, the mother answered, but she said it was a case of mistaken identity."

The Toronto duo returned to the capital to compile a paper trail. They got a birth certificate listing the identity number of Marcelina Cardona, the mother, as well as a copy of a ledger page with her picture.

"We went back to La Union armed with the truth," says Rosen. "This time I kept a video camera on my hip running.

"I was damned if I would go through all of this and not have a picture."

On the second visit, they were greeted by a woman of about 30. "Tim said, 'Oh look! Here comes your daughter's sister'... She looked exactly like my daughter."

Noting the "extreme poverty," Rosen says she told this woman they meant no harm. "I said if you're related to my daughter then I'm related to you. I am in a position to help you."

Two hours later, they were sitting in a courtyard with the birth mother.

"She told us she was 45 when she had my daughter. She already had 10 children and couldn't feed them. Her husband doesn't get much work, so she takes in laundry."

She gave birth to twin daughters, but she only brought one home, recounts Rosen. "My daughter weighed only three pounds and would have died, so her mother gave her up for adoption.

"No one in the family knew about her. When I appeared, I was the nightmare from hell."

Her daughter's siblings ranged in age from 16 to 34, and all, except the family's only son, were illiterate because the family couldn't afford the $75 annual tuition fee to send them to school.

"I was horrified to think that these people couldn't read or write."

Rosen was able to put her daughter's nieces and nephews in school and pay a private teacher to tutor the adults. She promised the principal she would find the funds to help educate other children in the village of 4,000.

Rosen's adoptive daughter met her biological mother about three months after her adoptive mother found her.

She went back for the wedding of one of her sisters, but she's not interested in more visits to her country of birth for now, Rosen says.

"She said, 'Now I know where I'm from, but it's not who I am.'

"I have always believed that she had to know her history to move forward with her life. If we don't know where we're from, we don't know where we're going."

The Fonz opens Ottawa federation's 2010 fundraising drive

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — After a morning visit to the students at Hillel Academy, Henry Winkler regaled an evening audience at Centrepointe Theatre with his charm, humour and inspirational message at the Sept. 15 launch of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa's 2010 fundraising campaign.

Winkler's keynote address attracted a crowd of 800 people of all ages — from those familiar with his children's books to those who mostly remember him as the Fonz on the long-running TV show Happy Days.

The campaign hopes to raise $5 million this year. The federation set the same goal for 2009, but only managed to collect $4.5 million.

The poor economy was part of the problem, federation executive director Jack Silverstein told the crowd, but some top donors also moved away and others died.

He encouraged people to give in spite of the recession, because the need for services is even greater now.

In his remarks, Winkler said he would never have dreamed how his life would unfold, growing up in New York City as the perpetually underachieving child of parents who constantly belittled him.

From being a child who had great difficulty learning to read to becoming a successful author of a dozen children's books is quite a leap. However, in the words of Theodor Herzl, which Winkler has adopted as his motto, "If you will it, it is no dream."

Though known for years as a successful actor, one who studied at the prestigious Yale School of Drama, Winkler struggled to get there.

Henry Winkler

He says that he knew from the age of seven that he wanted to become an actor, but "I am in the bottom three per cent in America academically. I applied to 28 colleges and got into two. In my first year, I almost flunked out of [Boston's] Emerson [College]," he said. "I finally graduated and applied to Yale School of Drama and somehow was accepted."

There must have been a fair amount left out of the story, but it did have a happy ending, and Winkler did go on to achieve success in his chosen field.

Only when Winkler was in his 30s and his son was diagnosed as dyslexic did he realize that he had the same symptoms and problems. What a difference that made to his self-confidence.

"If a child's image of himself is so bad because he can't keep up, he believes he is stupid," Winkler said.

It didn't help that his parents reinforced that message by constantly belittling him, he added. It was only after he became a star did they tell him – and the world – how proud they were of him.

Winkler encouraged his audience to make the most of their resources – to be the best they can be and show kindness and compassion to others.

"We must never forget who we are and where we came from," he said. "Thank you so much for listening to me – my parents never did."

Longtime Jewish community volunteer and activist Julia Koschitzky of Toronto was a special guest speaker at the campaign launch – her third of the week, after Winnipeg and Toronto.

"Seeing the young people in the room this evening gives you confidence in the future of the Jewish community of Ottawa," she said. "We are all aware that our global Jewish family is in decline… and that's why 80 per cent of all our efforts in our communities is focused on the next generation."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

MP credits Thornhill resident for idea

Uppal explained that MPs all draw numbers to determine in which order they are allowed to present private bills. He drew number 51, and the government is currently looking at Number 47.

"I was presented with a number of ideas, but this is one that really resonated with me. Interestingly, after I had decided on [accepting Kent's proposal], I ended up going to Israel with the Canada-Israel Committee in July. Being there, and learning what I did about the Holocaust and Israel, just made me feel more reassured that this was the right thing to do and get this bill passed," said Uppal, who is Sikh.

"I looked at this as a Canadian. Knowing Canadians need this, not just for the Jewish community," he said. "As a Sikh, as a visible minority in Canada... I think the root of all hate is the same, whether we're talking about anti-Semitism or racism in general."

Although Uppal has the political spotlight on him for this bill, Uppal said the credit for the idea should go to Laura Grosman, a fourth-year public administration student at the University of Ottawa who is minoring in Canadian Jewish studies.

Born and raised in Thornhill, Grosman, 21, is also executive director of the Canadian Memorial Holocaust Project.

She said she first approached Kent with her idea "over a year ago," before he was elected – a family friend with a connection to Kent helped broker the meeting, she said – after a discussion with one of her professors on the theme of Canadian contributions during World War II and the Holocaust.

"I explained to him what I hoped the monument would be able to signify and why I felt it was important for the government to do now," she said, adding that Kent has since supported her initiative "in any way he could."

Kent was unable to sponsor the private members bill himself because he's a cabinet minister.

"I wanted a place to reflect on those whose lives were cut short by the brutality of the Nazis, as well as to honour the Canadians who fought against state-sanctioned hatred and anti-Semitism. This monument will be a beacon to remind Canadians of the need to remain ever vigilant to protect the world from tyrannical oppression and atrocities against mankind," Grosman said.

As a grandchild of survivors, she said she's always had a "very intense interest" in the Holocaust because of her family history.

"I was shocked to realize there was no Holocaust memorial [in Ottawa]. I always thought there would be something," she said. The realization prompted her to take up the cause of a monument in Canada.

If Bill C-442 passes, the government will have one year to assemble a National Holocaust Monument Development Council, derived from public applicants who "possess a strong interest in, connection to, or familiarity with the Holocaust," according to the draft.

Grosman said she'll be the first one to apply.

Once in force, the bill requires that the council is assembled within one year and that it has three years to complete its mission. It will then be the council's responsibility to decide upon the final location of the monument, its design and also to organize fundraising to pay for the monument.

In a statement last week, Cotler said Grosman's initiative for a national Holocaust monument "will embody the imperatives of the act of remembrance and of the remembrance to act."

Wasylycia-Leis said the project is part of Canada's "obligation" to victims and survivors of the Shoah "and indeed to all of humanity that we never permit the unprecedented evil and hatred of the Holocaust to be forgotten or repeated."

Uppal said barring an election, which would scuttle all bills being considered in the current parliamentary session, he's hopeful his bill will pass by the end of the year.

Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber praised the bill as "an important statement" by the government and said his organization has supported Grosman's idea from its inception.

"To recognize, in some tangible fashion, probably the worst example of genocide in modern history ... it could stand as a warning for generations to come."

Ex-BB official innocent: lawyer

MONTREAL — The lawyer for former B'nai Brith Canada regional director Bill Surkis say he has submitted evidence to the Crown that will prove his client is innocent of child porn charges.

Steven Slimovitch said the evidence shows that videos found on Surkis' computer were for educational purposes only, which is allowed under the Criminal Code.

Surkis was due to appear in court Sept. 24, but his appearance was postponed to November to give the Crown time to review the new evidence, said Slimovitch, who is B'nai Brith's legal counsel.

Surkis was charged in May with accessing and possessing child pornography and released on bail, with conditions. The computer repair shop where he brought his computer for service notified police about questionable files it found on the hard drive.

Surkis, 69, left B'nai Brith more than two years ago. He had previously been executive director of the Montreal Holocaust Memorial Centre. — J.A.

OPEN LETTER TO THE COMMUNITY
FROM JEWISH FAMILY & CHILD

September 2009

You may have read recently that a former teacher at TanenbaumCHAT was arrested in Israel for alleged sexual abuse of a male student.

Since then, further allegations have come forward in Israel and in Toronto with reference to a number of Jewish institutions. We understand that this individual came into contact with many children and families and that numerous people may be affected by these allegations.

Jewish Family & Child is here for you, and we can help should you or your children have any questions or need to speak with a professional who can provide assistance and counseling.

We are available to take calls pertaining to any relevant incidents that you may wish to report. We have dedicated resources to assist you, whether you are a child or teen who was directly affected or, a parent, a teacher, a member of faculty or a friend.

We encourage you to contact JF&CS at 416.638.7800 | info@jfandcs.com

Land swap designed to ensure camp's survival

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Brenda Tessler-Donen, the director of the B'nai Brith Jewish community camp, is very "optimistic" that a planned land swap deal between the municipality of Kenora, Ont., and the province of Ontario will enable the camp to operate at its current location for many years to come.

The summer camp, known as BB Camp, which serves children in the Winnipeg Jewish community and is a beneficiary of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, is located 10 miles south of Kenora on Town Island in the Lake of the Woods.

Town Island has been owned by the municipality of Kenora since 1895. BB Camp has operated on the west side of the island since 1954, when it originally sub-leased the island from the Naval Cadet Camp, which leased it from the city of Kenora.

In 1996, BB Camp was only offered a 15-year lease by the city of Kenora, which expires in May 2011. In the last couple of years, the city of Kenora, which has lost its lumber mill, has been looking to expand its tax base by allowing development on the island, a move that would jeopardize the camp's future.

The planned land swap between Kenora and the Ontario Ministry of Natural Resources would see the Kenora-owned Town Island traded for Crown land of equal value within Kenora or adjacent to it.

Tessler-Donen is confident that once the land swap occurs, "we [BB Camp] would become tenants of the province of Ontario and we would be offered a long-term lease of a minimum of 50 years."

Kenora, Ontario facility serves Winnipeg children

Kenora gave its bureaucrats the go-ahead to pursue discussions with the province on the land swap initiative at an Aug. 10 city council meeting.

"The lands swap idea would be a win- win for everybody. The city of Kenora would rather obtain land currently owned by the province of Ontario that could be accessed by road to Kenora year round. Year-round residential property could be built on it, which could garner more taxes for the city of Kenora than would development of summer cottages on Town Island," Tessler told The CJN.

She added that the province of Ontario "sees Town Island as one of the last untouched pieces of Lake of the Woods," and this proposal would enable it to preserve the lake's water quality and address the issue of excessive development on it.

Israel Ludwig, incoming vice-president of the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, told The CJN that, "B'nai Brith Camp has been making overtures to buy Town Island from the city of Kenora for the last several years, but those overtures were being rebuffed because the city wanted to develop the island to gain tax revenues. Cottage owners in nearby islands preferred the camp over new development. My friend and colleague, lawyer Bruce Ormiston of Kenora [who served on Kenora City Council for a three-year term] is the one who came up with this land swap idea… We are hoping that the swap will happen before BB Camp's lease is up, but even if not, we have received assurances that the camp's lease will be extended until the swap is in place."

Tessler-Donen said that in 1954, "when the Jewish community first started operating the camp, the city of Kenora wouldn't directly enter into a lease with Jews, and, therefore, we had to sublease it from the Naval Cadet Camp.

"The fact that the city of Kenora wouldn't sell land to Jews is why historically we never had the opportunity to buy the island in the first place."

Cabby won't remove Jewish objects from taxi

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A Cote St. Luc cab driver vows he will launch an immediate appeal if a municipal court orders him to pay $1,400 in tickets for having Jewish religious artifacts and personal items in his taxi.

"Within 24 hours, I will do it," Arieh Perecowicz promised in a phone interview with The CJN.

The 65-year-old native Israeli, who's been driving a cab mostly in Montreal's west end for 43 years, was referring to his scheduled date in municipal court this week and his almost three-year battle to keep photos of his family, small Israeli and Canadian flags, and a Remembrance Day poppy affixed neatly to the dashboard of his Veterans taxi.

Most significantly, the alleged offences also apply to several Jewish religious items he also carries in his cab: a photo of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe, Menachem Schneerson, and two mezuzot, which are attached between the front and back seats.

Perecowicz said that's a breach of his religious freedom.

The six tickets Perecowicz has been given since December 2006 were all issued by the Bureau du taxi, a municipal agency that regulates the industry.

"I've ignored them all," he said.

In February 2007, Perecowicz also filed a complaint with the Quebec Human Right Commission (QHRC), which has agreed to hear the case, but which can take several years to investigate and rule on.

That makes no difference to Perecowicz, who believes that regulation Number 98 of the Bureau's bylaws, which prohibits a taxi from carrying "objects or inscriptions" not required for the taxi to "be in service," is far too vague.

"There are two things wrong with it," he said: "First, there's no list of what you can have or cannot have, and second, it's beyond the mandate of [the Bureau to address religious rights]. That's a Charter issue, a federal issue."

As well, "There is no clutter in my car," Perecowicz said. "It's clean, and doesn't interfere with anything in the back seat."

Despite recent tongue-in-cheek media stories about him, Perecowicz is taking his case very seriously and said the whole thing has been an ordeal. He believes he's being singled out by the Bureau, because only two days before receiving his first ticket in 2006, he and others cabbies complained on television that the Bureau was too lax about tolerating unlicensed cabs in the city.

"Two days later, A little bit coincidental, isn't it?" Perecowicz asked. "For 43 years, nobody complained. How coincidental could it be?"

Perecowicz said he conducted research going back 16 years, and as far as he could tell, no other cab driver has ever been issued a ticket for the same infraction.

"Look inside any Greek [driver's] taxi," he said. "You won't see one that doesn't have a religious icon of the Madonna in it, or beads."

And how is having personal items in his taxi, Perecowicz wondered, any different that a doctor having family photos in his office?

"You can say when a member of the public comes into the office, that's a 'public space,' too," he said.

While Perecowicz doesn't believe there was any anti-Semitism "per se" in the Bureau, he believes that in retaliating for his actions on the unlicensed cabs issue, the Bureau deliberately chose to enforce a regulation that would hit him "where it hurts."

"Personal and religious articles mean something to me," Perecowicz said. "They could have given me a ticket for [some minor infraction], but they didn't."

"That's the part that I think was discriminatory and anti-Semitic."

"When someone chooses to get you vis-à-vis your religion, then I would like you to define for me what it means."

Arieh Perecowicz

Since the issue erupted, Perecowicz said he enlisted the support of the Quebec Jewish Congress (QJC).

Abby Shawn, chair of QJC's human rights committee, told The CJN that while Perecowicz's situation has the potential makings of a Charter case, it's not there yet.

That could develop, she said, once the QHRC makes its ruling. "It does raise certain issues," she said, but the main one before the municipal court appeared to be the "vagueness" of Bureau regulation Number 98.

Perecowicz, meanwhile, said he has received only positive feedback from people who enter his cab, even in his rare trips to the city's east end.

His situation has also take a toll, despite support from his wife Valerie and their three children.

"It's been gehinom [hell]," Perecowicz said. "It's probably already cost me double the amount of the tickets, time from work, and sleep, sometimes two, three or four hours.

"But when they made the decision to go after me, they picked the wrong person," he said.

A woman who answered the phone at the Bureau du taxi said it was not prepared to respond to requests for comment before the court proceedings this week.

Happy Birthday Mr. Cohen

MONTREAL — Leonard Cohen's 75th birthday was celebrated not only by admirers in his native Montreal with an evening of poetry reading but also by a fan in outer space last week.

Canadian astronaut Robert Thirsk, who is orbiting Earth in the International Space Station, sent a videotaped message on the occasion of the famous poet-singer's birthday on Sept. 21 that was played at the party.

Prof says York unjustly targeting him

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

History professor David Noble's five-year crusade against York University won't end until an Ontario Human Rights Tribunal rules on his complaint that the school has conducted a campaign of reprisal against him since he challenged its practice of cancelling classes on Jewish High Holidays.

Noble, who is Jewish, has been butting heads with York since 2004, when he accused York of adhering to a practice that discriminated against non-Jewish students who didn't get the same consideration.

In 2006, Noble filed a complaint with the Ontario Human Rights Commission, which, after an investigation, said that the "practice of not scheduling classes on Jewish High Holidays clearly results in differential treatment on the basis of creed."

York decided to keep classrooms open this year, before the commission ruled on the case, although a York spokesperson said the decision "had nothing to do" with Noble's complaint.

Also in 2004, Noble distributed a flyer called The Tail that Wags the Dog, which suggested that some members of the York University Foundation, York's fundraising arm, were staunch pro-Israel supporters and were the reason why a Jewish pro-Palestinian activist was expelled for his role in a noisy campus protest.

Noble had sought $10 million and a formal apology from the university after it released a statement that said that the flyer was "targeting Jewish members of the York community."

In 2007, an arbitrator ordered York to pay him $2,500 for "failing to respect Prof. Noble's rights as an academic," and it was also ordered to withdraw the statement from its website.

Last month, Noble testified before a human rights tribunal, presided over by Michael Gottheil, because of "the reprisals undertaken by York against me in response to my efforts to end the discrimination," Noble wrote in a statement.

"In the wake of my ultimately successful efforts to end York's discriminatory practice, I endured reprisal and threat of reprisal from the York administration, acting in league with and in response to pressure from external Zionist organizations," he said, referring to Canadian Jewish Congress, Hillel, United Israel Appeal and B'nai Brith.

Among those who took the stand at the tribunal last month are former York president Lorna Marsden and current York president Mamdouh Shoukri.

Noble, who represented himself, claimed York administration changed his class times to "distinctly unfavourable" time slots, attacked him for being an "anti-Semite, a bigot, and a racist," and threatened him with reprisal if he held classes on the Jewish High Holidays in 2005.

Closing arguments will be presented on Nov. 3 and a ruling will be made by Gottheil at a later date.

Ont. teen spends summer at Weizmann

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

Leah Rosetti has always been a science buff. After spending July in Israel at the Weizmann Institute of Science on a scholarship, Rosetti says her desire to pursue a career in the field is greater than ever.

"I've been in the sciences my whole life, but I never had such a lengthy, hands-on experience until this," said the 18-year-old from Thorold, Ont. "Since I've been back home, it's really given me a drive to work hard and a want to build myself into someone who can change the world through the sciences."

Rosetti was one of seven Canadian high school students who participated in the 41st Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence Summer Science Institute program this year. Annually, about 75 students worldwide who excel in science are given the opportunity to work alongside professionals on current fields of research.

Students choose to work within a specific category of interest such as biochemistry, biology or computer sciences. After three weeks of lab work, they attend a school in the Judean Desert near the Dead Sea where, among other things, they explore the ecological and geographical structure of the region.

"That one month changed my life. In [high] school, I [was] around sciences everyday for an hour, but this was every day all day, totally immersed in what I love, and I was able to refine my skills."

Rosetti graduated from Denis Morris High School, a Catholic school in St. Catharines, Ont., last year. She began her science degree at the start of September at Mount Allison University in Sackville, N.B., where she plans to major in biochemistry.

She said her experience in Israel has increased her motivation to work hard in university.

"I'm not going to give up, that's for sure. There will probably be times that will be excruciatingly frustrating, but I have to remind myself of this past summer.

"I am still in awe of all I saw and did, and I can't take my current opportunity in school for granted now."

In high school, Rosetti racked up the science awards.

She was the co-inaugural recipient of the Bruno Dammizio Award of Excellence, a scholarship presented to Denis Morris' graduating male and female with the highest averages throughout their four years of school.

Her project, Designing a Novel SAM Mimic as an Inhibitor of AHL Synthase, won her a bronze medal at the Canada-wide science fair in Winnipeg in May, and also earned her the Weizmann Institute scholarship.

Her project looked at the quorum sensing – or chemical communication – within the bacteria that cause pneumonia. When the bacterial colony reaches a benchmark size, determined by the quorum sensing, it creates biofilm, a sugar-like coating for more resistance to antibiotics. She therefore wanted to stop the production of quorum sensing to more effectively fight the pneumonia-causing bacteria.

"It's an amazing concept, but I can't take credit for it," she said. "I heard about the concept and I simply worked on it."

She also said she did the easy part.

"All we did at Weizmann was run tests and experiments for a drug that would stop the quorum sensing. We made a suggested model. But now the drug needs to be made."

She said that work on the drug might soon begin at Brock University, where Rosetti was a participant in the school's science mentorship program last year.

"The mentoring helped me focus my studies for my project that ultimately got me to Israel."

The other Canadian participants were Ryan Luxenberg, Ben Deverett, Jean-Olivier Lambert, Jillian Oliver, Linda Liu and Shawn Bramson.

"I'm thankful to all my fellow Canadians, and the Jewish participants gave me a background of Israel, so I was able to appreciate the experience more."

MDA more than an ambulance service

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Magen David Adom for Israel may be best known for its emergency vehicles, but the organization provides much more than that, said its president, Dr. Yehuda Skornick.

Head of surgery at the Tel Aviv Sourasky Medical Center and professor of surgery at Tel Aviv University, Skornick spoke recently at a luncheon meeting of Canadian Magen David Adom for Israel (CMDA), held at the offices of Blake, Cassels & Graydon.

He said that Magen David Adom provides more than 95 per cent of all blood and blood components to Israeli hospitals, trains more than 50,000 people a year in first-aid basics and more complex paramedical skills, helps other countries build their own emergency systems, and runs the MDA Israel Cord Bank, which collects donated umbilical cord blood following the birth of healthy children.

The cord bank – CMDA has donated $300,000 to this project – tests and types the stem cells, which have the ability to develop into any of the body's tissue types and are currently used primarily to treat cancers and blood disorders.

"The advantage of cord blood is that it is safely collected, and it is endlessly available. We now perform about 200 transplants a year and have about 526,000 donors registered."

After a potential donor gives birth, Skornick said, the blood is tested – usually about 35 per cent is suitable – and then is deeply frozen and documented in a computer.

Although the cord blood is now used only for cancer treatment, Skornick said that eventually it will be used for other purposes, such as the regeneration of damaged organs.

Since 2006, he said, a number of units have been transported to other countries including Turkey, Argentina, Brazil, Sweden, Italy and, just recently, to Belgium.

Israel also helps other countries who seek its advice in dealing with terrorist attacks, he said. "They need guidelines, continuous training, education and drills. We've undertaken training in many Jewish communities around the world, and we teach them how to behave in the event of an attack."

In Israel, response time for the first ambulance to reach the scene of an attack is 3.9 minutes, he said, and the first evacuation takes about 10 minutes.

"The last urgent casualty is removed after about 25 minutes, and within one hour, the last casualty is evacuated. [We call it] scoop and run. We do the necessary things to get to the hospital, and every hospital has a MDA representative so they are always ready."

The regional dispatch centre is always ready for the worst-case scenario, he said. "We've learned from our past. During the Yom Kippur War, hundreds of soldiers were injured in one minute, and we didn't know what to do. We teach people now that the first ones to arrive on the scene should try to help the patients – even if they are not skilled paramedics.

"Lives are saved if things are done immediately. Bystanders can help out by carrying stretchers, [for example]."

When there are a lot of wounded patients, he said, paramedics have to give up treating those who have no chance. "It is difficult, but they have to treat the patients that have a chance first."

Dishes for Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah

By NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Sara Finkel's latest cookbook, The Complete Yom Tov Cookbook: Winning Recipes for Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkos (Targum), includes delectable, well-planned menus for every festive celebration, from Rosh Hashanah to Simchat Torah.

Finkel includes helpful do-ahead preparation suggestions and terrific tips that will be appreciated by busy balabustas who need to prepare dozens of delicious holiday meals for their family and guests.

With over 100 tried-and-tested recipes and colourful photos throughout, this small book is packed with big ideas as well as illuminating articles about each holiday. The recipes call for easily available ingredients and can be made with minimum fuss. These are a collection of Sara Finkel's favourite recipes, culled from her two best-selling cookbooks, Classic Kosher Cooking and Classic Kosher Cooking: Simply Delicious. Enjoy these scrumptious dishes this weekend to wind up the High Holiday celebrations in style!

CHALLAH-APPLE KUGEL

Also known as "bread pudding." Use up leftover challah with this delicious sweet recipe.

1 whole challah, thickly sliced
4 eggs
1 cup white sugar or 3/4 cup brown sugar plus 4 tbsp. white sugar
3/4 cup oil
1 1/2 tsp. salt
1 package instant vanilla pudding
2 1/3 cup raisins
1 tsp. cinnamon

Remove crust from challah and soak in hot water. Let cool and squeeze out water. In a mixing bowl, beat eggs until fluffy. Add 3/4 cup sugar, oil, salt, and vanilla pudding and mix until smooth. Stir in the challah, sliced apples and raisins.

Place in a 9 x 12-in. greased baking pan. Combine cinnamon with remaining sugar and sprinkle on top. Bake at 350 for 1 hour. Serves 12.

Variations:

- coconut bread pudding: add 1 cup coconut
- fruit bread pudding: stir in 1 cup of chopped dates or raisins
- nut bread pudding: add 1/2 to 2/3 cup coarsely chopped nuts.
- caramel bread pudding: caramelize 1/2 cup sugar, stirring it in a pan until brown. Pour in a little of the water from the soaked challah over the caramelized sugar in the pan as you stir it. Add to kugel.
- banana bread pudding: add 1 cup mashed banana to mixture, omit the apples and decrease liquid slightly.
- individual kugelettes: spoon mixture into greased cupcake pans. Bake 35 to 40 minutes.

RED CABBAGE SALAD

1 (16-oz.) bag shredded red cabbage (about 8 cups)
1 mango, cut in 1/2-in. cubes
1 red onion, diced
1/3 cup slivered almonds
6 tbsp. vinegar
1/3 cup oil
1/2 tsp. salt
pepper, to taste
6 tbsp. sugar
1 1/2 tbsp. sesame seeds

In a salad bowl, combine red cabbage, mango, onion and slivered almonds. In a separate bowl, combine vinegar, oil, salt, pepper and sugar. Pour over the vegetables and toss together well. Sprinkle with sesame seeds. Serve chilled. Serves 8.

- Variation 1: Add a handful of dried cranberries instead of mango.
- Variation 2: Add 3 oz. sugared almonds and 3/4 cup toasted angel hair pasta. Omit the mango, sesame seeds and slivered almonds.

CHINESE CHICKEN BLINTZES

Otherwise known as homemade egg rolls - a special Chinese food appetizer.

10 blintz leaves (see recipe below)
Filling
1 1/2 cups boneless cooked chicken, diced
salt, to taste
1 tsp. sugar
2 tbsp. tamari sauce
1 small onion, diced
1 (4 oz.) can sliced mushrooms, drained
1 to 2 cups bean sprouts
2 scallions, thinly sliced
1 tsp. cornstarch
1 egg, beaten (optional)
oil for frying

To prepare filling: combine chicken with salt, sugar and tamari sauce. Set aside. Sauté onion until tender. Add mushrooms, bean sprouts and scallions, and sauté for several minutes. Add chicken mixture to frying pan. Cook on low heat for a few minutes. Push mixture to one side of pan. Stir cornstarch into liquid in empty half of pan until smooth. Combine cornstarch with chicken mixture. Let cool.

Place 1 to 2 tbsp. of mixture in the centre of each blintz leaf. Roll, tucking in ends, and seal well. (Use a toothpick or brush with a beaten egg to help seal.) Fry each blintz in oil until golden brown and crisp. Yields 10 blintzes.

BLINTZ BATTER

1 1/4 cups flour
1 1/2 cups water
1/2 tsp. salt
2 eggs
2 tbsp. oil
oil, for frying

Mix batter ingredients together until smooth. Refrigerate at least one hour. When ready to use, stir well. Lightly oil a 7 or 8-inch frying pan and heat. Pour in 2 to 3 tablespoons of batter, tilting pan to distribute a thin coating evenly on bottom. Cook over medium-high heat until top of blintz is dry. No need to flip. Turn blintz out of pan and stack on a clean, dry paper towel.

Yields 15 blintzes. (You can freeze any leftover blintz leaves for another time.)

JUMP's managing director nominated for Jewish Community Hero Award

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Debbie Osiel's volunteerism and activism in the Jewish community was never motivated by a desire to be recognized, but her efforts have not gone unnoticed by those who voted for her in hopes she'll become the next Jewish Community Hero.

As of last week, Osiel, 29, the managing director of Toronto's Jewish Urban Meeting Place (JUMP) – a non-profit organization dedicated to providing young adults with social, educational, volunteer and travel opportunities – collected more than 600 votes in an effort to win the $25,000 Jewish Community Hero Award provided by the Jewish Federations of North America.

Communities across North America are encouraged to vote until Oct. 8 for Jewish leaders who strive to strengthen their communities and repair the world.

Osiel is currently in the running with about 350 other nominees to win the $25,000 grant that will go toward non-profit efforts through their local federations or another recognized charity.

The 20 nominees who collect the most votes will make the semifinal round, and a panel of judges will select five finalists.

At the United Jewish Communities General Assembly in Washington, D.C., one of the five finalists will be awarded the top prize, while the other four finalists will receive a smaller amount to be used as an investment in their community project or non-profit effort.

"I'm very honoured and I'm very flattered," said Osiel, who was nominated anonymously. "The way I have to look at the attention I'm getting is that I can use this to inspire others."

Osiel, who grew up in the Jewish day school system and holds a post-graduate diploma in marketing management, has been an active part of her tight-knit Jewish community in Toronto since she was a teenager.

"I remember my dad used to run a baseball league for Petah Tikva [Congregation] and so every [week] we used to pack up the car, the bases, the bats, the bags, and have a barbecue... I was like my dad's sidekick," she said.

Years later, Osiel has involved herself with countless organizations that work to raise money for the needy, create connections with Israel, and keep Jewish youth connected to their community.

"Thankfully, I was blessed with two arms, two legs and the capability to communicate with people. If we were just put on this planet to do day-to-day work and go home, life wouldn't be so fulfilling, but if we're able to give back, every body, every form, every mental capability should be giving back in one way," she said.

Osiel has lent her time and expertise to organizations including Beit Halochem, which aids disabled Israeli war veterans and victims of terror; the Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee, which holds an annual party to encourage youth to become involved in the political process and support Israel; and Ezrat Achim, a non-profit charitable organization that provides Jewish families with financial aid, as well as kosher food for Shabbat and Jewish holidays.

She said that as the food drive co-ordinator for Ezrat Achim, she organizes deliveries of food every other week to families in need.

"Around the holidays, we run food drives, so right now, I'm in the middle of co-ordinating the food drive," she said, just days before Rosh Hashanah.

"We're going to be feeding 40 families, and it's pretty incredible because within that, we get to inspire other people to get involved through delivering, through packaging."

Osiel said that she also tries to use her experience in event planning and marketing to bring publicity and raise awareness about lesser-known causes.

"I sit on the women's division for the State of Israel bonds... I know that I'm a person in the Jewish community that is somewhat of a public person, so I try to use that to influence others," she said.

She added that as a former committee member of Reena's popular Not Just Another Saturday Night annual fundraising event for people with developmental disabilities, she chose to offer her services to the Zareinu Educational Centre – which provides special education and therapy to children with physical and developmental challenges – as the centre needs help bringing its name to the forefront.

"I try to sit with Zareinu, and I'm consulting with one of the new people there about what we can do to build their name," Osiel said.

She said that although she realizes that her interests might be different from other women her age, she loves staying active in the community.

"It's funny because people often ask me, 'What are your interests? What do you do?' And other people might say, 'I go to the movies, I go to bars.' And I would say, 'I like sitting on committees with people twice my age and I learn things.'"

She said that earlier this year, she went to see the film Defiance, about Jewish brothers during World War II who escape the Nazis by fleeing into the forest and leading hundreds of Jews to fight them.

"Right when the film ended, I sat in my chair in the theatre and I turned to the person I was with and I said, 'This is why I do what I do.' Because if they can sit in a forest and they can fight like that, I think that when I do what I do, it's nothing compared to that," Osiel said.

"I understand that some people have more challenges than others. If someone is only able to contribute once a year and I'm able to contribute a few times a month, what they do is no less than what I do."

Osiel's work in the Jewish community doesn't end with volunteerism. As JUMP's managing director, her career is based on working to inspire Jewish youth to get involved in whatever way they can.

"When people come up to me and say, 'Thank you for such a great opportunity. How can I help?' – that's what inspires me," she said.

Right now, Osiel said she's focusing on moving the two-year-old centre from Yonge and Centre streets in Thornhill to a new location in Toronto at 1992 Yonge St., near Davisville Avenue.

The hope is that it will be open this month, but she promised that there will still be programming and Shabbat dinners north of the city.

As for her chance to win a $25,000 grant, Osiel said that if she does win, she'd like to put it toward the many charities and non-profits she's worked for.

"I just hope to continue to build on the gift that I've been given right now, which is to give back," she said. "I just feel like I'm so young and there is so much more to do."

G-20 leaders demand Iran open nuclear facilities

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

PITTSBURGH — Using harsh diplomatic language, the leaders of the United States, Britain and France issued a strongly worded joint condemnation last Friday over the existence of a second Iranian uranium enrichment plant, revealed earlier in the week by Tehran.

Appearing together to issue a statement ahead of the opening of the G-20 economic summit in Pittsburgh, all three condemned the actions of the Iranian government and warned that Tehran has a limited deadline to comply with international requirements or face tighter sanctions.

Speaking first, U.S. President Barack Obama said that the three nations had presented the UN nuclear watchdog, the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), with detailed information regarding the second Iranian plant.

"Iran has been building a covert uranium enrichment facility... for several years," Obama said. "We expect the IAEA to immediately investigate this disturbing information."

"Iran's decision to build the nuclear plant underscores its unwillingness to meet international obligations and represents a direct challenge to the basic contract at the centre of the non-proliferation agreement," he went on. "Iran is breaking rules that all nations must follow."

French President Nicolas Sarkozy warned that Iran has until December to change its approach to international concerns about its nuclear program, or "sanctions will have to be taken."

"Everything must be put on the table now," Sarkozy said. "Iran is taking the international community on a dangerous path and we cannot let the Iranian leaders gain time while the [centrifuge] motors are running."

British Prime Minister Gordon Brown, meanwhile, mentioned an October deadline for Iranian co-operation and warned of the dangers of the regime's program.

"Iran's nuclear program is the most urgent proliferation challenge the world faces today," Brown said. "The level of deception by the Iranian government... will shock and anger the whole international community, and harden our resolve."

Brown added that "we are prepared to implement further and more stringent sanctions against Iran if it doesn't comply with UN Security Council resolutions by Oct. 1."

The IAEA earlier Friday demanded access to the second plant, which it was informed of by Tehran on Sept. 21.

Two officials told the Associated Press on Friday that Iran revealed the existence of the second plant in a letter to International Atomic Energy Agency chief Mohamed ElBaradei.

IAEA spokesperson Marc Vidricaire confirmed receipt of the letter, saying the agency was informed that a new pilot fuel enrichment plant is under construction. The letter said the plant wouldn't enrich uranium beyond the five per cent level suitable for civilian energy production. That would be substantially below the threshold of 90 per cent or more needed for a weapon.

Iran told the agency that no nuclear material has been introduced into the facility, he said. In response, the IAEA has asked Iran to provide specific information and access to the facility as soon as possible.

Israel and the West have warned that Iran is engaged in a secret nuclear arms program. Iran has denied the claim, maintaining that its program is purely civilian.

The officials said that Iran's letter contained no details about the location of the second facility, when – or if – it had started operations or the type and number of centrifuges it was running.

But one of the officials, who had access to a review of western intelligence on the issue, said it was about 160 kilometres southwest of Tehran and was the site of 3,000 centrifuges that could be operational by next year.

The officials who spoke to AP – one from a European government with access to IAEA information and the other a diplomat in Vienna from a country accredited to the IAEA – demanded anonymity Friday because their information was confidential. One said he had seen the Iranian letter. The other told AP that he had been informed about it by a UN official.

Iranian officials have previously acknowledged having only one plant – which is under IAEA monitoring and denied allegations of undeclared nuclear activities.

An August IAEA report said Iran has set up more than 8,000 centrifuges to churn out enriched uranium at its cavernous underground facility outside the southern city of Natanz. The report said that only about 4,600 centrifuges were fully active.

Ahmadinejad made no mention of the plant during his visit this week to New York for a meeting of the United Nations General Assembly and rather stressed the fact that Iran had fully co-operated with IAEA inspectors and that allegations of a nuclear weapons program are fabrications.

Crowd ecstatic at Cohen concert

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

RAMAT GAN — Veteran singer Leonard Cohen took to the stage at Ramat Gan stadium last Thursday night after breaking an Israeli record when all the tickets for his show were sold out in less than 12 hours, despite costing between 1,000 and 1,200 shekels ($265 to $320 US).

Seconds after Cohen took to the stage in his legendary tailored suit and hat, the 75-year-old singer-songwriter softly uttered a Hebrew prayer in front of some 50,000 people curious to see how the renowned poet, writer and singer planned to overcome the distance between the stage and the people tens of metres in the back.

Ramat Gan stadium was not the most suitable venue for a Leonard Cohen concert. But the very instant the music began and Cohen started singing Dance Me to the End of Love, his celebrated deep voice overcame every centimetre of distance and signalled the triumphant tone of the entire evening.

Everyone in the audience felt like Cohen was personally singing to them, and the enthusiastic and even ecstatic crowd wouldn't let the singer leave until his third encore.

Cohen himself appeared touched by the gesture.

Before the concert, an event was held in the VIP section of the stadium for the Leonard Cohen Fund for Reconciliation, Tolerance and Peace, which gives support to bereaved Israeli and Palestinian families. At this event, grants were given to people who have suffered personally from the Israeli-Palestinian conflict but continue to believe in peace and work to achieve it.

Around 200 bereaved Israeli and Palestinian families attended the concert, among them renowned novelist David Grossman. Many other celebrities and movers and shakers of Israeli society were there as well.

Cohen had announced about two months ago that the proceeds from his performance in Israel would go toward the reconciliation fund, after his plan to perform in Israel sparked opposition.

A pro-Palestinian group called the Palestinian Campaign for the Academic and Cultural Boycott of Israel urged the singer to cancel the show and launched a protest campaign. And some Palestinian activists called for a boycott because of Israel's invasion of Gaza, which was aimed at stopping daily rocket attacks.

Cohen responded to the criticisms by offering to perform in the West Bank city of Ramallah. However, that offer was rejected by the Palestinian protesters. He then said all proceeds would go to Israeli-Palestinian peace organizations.

Initially, Cohen asked Amnesty International to help him distribute the funds, which he hoped would help smaller groups that work for coexistence between Israelis and Palestinians. But Amnesty backed out of that arrangement, so Cohen started his own charity to distribute money to community groups. The charity is run by a board of Israelis and Palestinians.

During the concert, organizers screened some translations of Cohen's songs. But the translations were likely unnecessary, as it seemed that most of the concert goers knew the English lyrics by heart.

Cohen last performed in Israel in 1975. Before that, he entertained Israeli troops during the Yom Kippur War in 1973.

Canada takes lead in boycotting Ahmadinejad and our absence there will speak volumes about how Canada feels about the declarations of President Ahmadinejad."

Echoing those remarks, Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon stated the Canadian boycott was prompted by Iran's violation of the human rights of its own citizens and foreign nationals, the death of Canadian photojournalist Zahra Kazemi, its violent response against demonstrators "following the fraudulent presidential election" in June, Ahmadinejad's continuing denial of the Holocaust and its continuing desire to become a nuclear power.

Opposition leader Michael Ignatieff supported the speech boycott. "If we do not speak out – if we stand silent – we are allowing evil to triumph. Boycotting President Ahmadinejad's speech is absolutely the right thing to do."

Jewish organizations applauded the government's decision to protest Ahmadinejad's address. Moshe Ronen, chair of the Canada-Israel Committee (CIC), the Jewish community's lobbying arm for Israel, said "we are very proud of the leadership our prime minister and government has shown with regard to the ugly anti-Semitism by the Iranian leadership."

Canada, which announced a day earlier it would stay away from Ahmadinejad's address, "was ahead of the pack," Ronen said.

Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center said, "In walking out, Canada is making a strong statement about the country's relations with Iran. President Ahmadinejad needs to know that when he speaks, Canada doesn't listen."

B'nai Brith Canada commended Canada's "principled move to take the lead and announce that our nation [would] not be present… when Ahmadinejad comes to the stage to spout his venom and anti-Semitism.

"Canadians should be thankful that we have a government that, once again, has taken the lead and acted with principle on issues related to the Middle East," said Frank Dimant, B'nai Brith Canada's executive vice-president.

In New York, Harper met late last week with Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu. Officials with the Prime Minister's Office said they discussed the strong ties between Canada and Israel and prospects for the peace process,'Canadian Press reported.

Ahmadinejad used the UN forum to criticize Israel's attack on Gaza and to accuse it of subjecting the Palestinians to genocide. He also accused the West of hypocrisy, saying it preached democracy but violated fundamental principles.

"How can one imagine that the inhuman policies in Palestine may continue?" he said. "How can crimes of the occupiers against defenceless women and children and destruction of their homes, farms, hospitals and schools be supported unconditionally by certain governments?"

Employing classic anti-Semitic stereotypes, Ahmadinejad said, "It is no longer acceptable that a small minority would dominate the politics, economy and culture of major parts of the world by its complicated networks, and establish a new form of slavery and harm the reputation of other nations, even European nations and the United States, to attain its racist ambitions."

Netanyahu, who was in New York during last week's UN session, said he did not attend U.S. President Barack Obama's address so "as not to sit in the same hall with the president of Iran, who has denied the murder of six million Jews and calls for the annihilation of six million more."

Michael Oren, Israel's ambassador to the United States, called Ahmadinejad's address "a cry for truth from a Holocaust denier, a cry for democracy from a leader who shoots freedom-seeking protesters, and a cry for peace from the world's biggest sponsor of terror, who aspires to annihilate a UN member nation."

UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon told Netanyahu he had condemned Ahmadinejad's Holocaust-denial on three occasions and that his repeated calls to destroy Israel were unacceptable.

In Berlin, meanwhile, German Foreign Minister Frank-Walter Steinmeier called Ahmadinejad "a disgrace to his country" and said his remarks were "intolerable."

In Ottawa, Ignatieff agreed with the decision to boycott the speech, but questioned why "Harper has refused to take action in Canada to hold the Iranian regime to account.

"In the absence of Conservative leadership, the Liberal party has taken the lead in Canada and around the world to hold Iran's leadership to account for domestic repression, nuclear proliferation and state-sanctioned incitement to genocide."

Referring to a bill introduced by Liberal MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler – the Iran Accountability Act – and the Responsibility to Prevent petition against the Iranian leadership, both endorsed by the Liberal party, Ignatieff asked why the Tories hadn't joined "in this condemnation… They have been silent. Where Liberals have been leading by example, Mr. Harper hasn't been leading at all."

Ronen, however, suggested the concurrence of the two largest parties on the speech boycott shows "there is no space between the parties on the position of Israel on important issues."

Israel can't be considered a "wedge issue" in Canadian politics, and he said CIC had "been able to point out to the parties facts on the ground, so the parties reached policy positions that are natural for Canada as a democratic country to support."

Ronen said Canada should continue to exercise international leadership by pushing for economic sanctions against Iran. "Canada has a very important role to play in convincing countries that do business with Iran to up the ante in terms of what Iran's government has to lose if it continues this mad dash to nuclear capacity."

He called for "crippling economic sanctions to stop this madness. Because the alternative [military action] is much more dramatic, more serious, with troubling complications for everyone."

Ukrainian council condemned for defending Demjanjuk

JTA

LVOV — The Ukrainian Jewish Committee has condemned the Lvov regional council for defending Nazi guard John Demjanjuk.

Lawmakers in the Ukrainian city of Lvov are claiming that the upcoming trial in Germany of Demjanjuk, whose service at the Sobibor concentration camp caused him to be stripped of his American citizenship and deported, is an international conspiracy to discredit Ukraine in world opinion, the Kyiv Post reported last Thursday.

"Undoubtedly, this case has been falsified and fabricated by the KGB a long time ago, and is now being fuelled by the Russian FSB and other states, which have hastened to take in this provocative bait," the Lvov legislature said in an appeal to Ukraine's president, prime minister and parliament, the newspaper reported.

The Ukrainian Jewish Committee said that the lawmakers are making "a big mistake."

"Ukrainians are perceived globally as a winning nation in World War II, a nation that suffered the largest losses in the fight against fascism. Lvov deputies' provocative appeals are asserting undesirable and unobjective associations in the minds of many," the committee said in a statement.

Demjanjuk, 89, is charged in Germany with being an accessory to the murder of some 27,900 Jews in the gas chambers at the Sobibor extermination camp in Poland.

In the early 1980s, he was accused of being the notorious guard "Ivan the Terrible" at the Treblinka death camp, but was released from jail in Israel after seven years when another Ukrainian was identified as "Ivañ."

The U.S. Justice Department charged Demjanjuk with being a guard at Sobibor and revoked his citizenship in 2002 for lying about his Nazi past. His deportation was approved in 2005. Germany requested his extradition in March.

He was extradited to Germany in May, where he remains in jail.

Argentina's president urges extradition of AMIA suspects

JTA

NEW YORK — Argentina's president called for the extradition to her country of Iranian officials wanted in the 1994 bombing of the Buenos Aires Jewish centre.

In her Sept. 23 speech to the UN General Assembly, Cristina Fernandez de Kirchner called for the extradition of the suspects wanted by Interpol for the bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre, which killed 85 people in 1994. The bombing was allegedly carried out by Hezbollah agents with Iranian sponsorship and organization, but Argentina hasn't been able to bring anyone to justice for the attack.

Neri School gives youth at risk breath of fresh air

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM – When 16-year-old Idan's parents got divorced in Holon, Israel, five years ago, he began to get into fights at school. He got suspended, was arrested for and charged with assault, and spent some time in a juvenile detention centre.

Then, five months ago, his social worker applied on his behalf to the new Neri School, an alternative education centre for youth at risk, located on the lush open-air campus of the Ein Yael Living Museum in southwest Jerusalem, a 40-acre archeological park that dates back 4,000 years to the Middle Bronze Age.

"Idan has very good potential," says Hanan Barzilay, principal of the Neri School. "We hope his time here will help him to stop being violent and change the route of his life."

"I am very happy here," says Idan, one of six students at the school who also live at the centre's affiliated Yaelim Hostel near the school. "The students here get a lot more attention and more freedom."

Idan is one of 17 youths from across Israel, ages 14 to18, of different backgrounds – secular and religious, Jewish and Arab, new immigrants and Israeli-born – who began this school year at the newly constructed Neri School, a unique facility catering to students who suffer from severe learning and behavioural problems and chaotic home environments. They share only one thing: the Neri School is their last opportunity to complete their high school diploma and get their lives on track before they turn 19 and no longer fall under the state's jurisdiction.

Harry Bloomfield and his sister, Evelyn Bloomfield Schachter, stand alongside the Neri School in Jerusalem.

"It's like planting a tree," Barzilay says. "When you plant it sideways, it's very hard to fix. But that's what we are doing here: trying to straighten out these trees and give them a last chance to grow straight and tall."

The school's curriculum, the Yaelim Program, was established four years ago, before there was a school facility. It is sponsored jointly by the Ministry of Welfare's Einav Organization for the Advancement of Youth, the Ministry of Education, the Jerusalem Municipality, the Ein Yael Museum, the Joint Distribution Committee's (JDC) Ashalim Association for Planning and Development of Services for Children and Youth at Risk and Their Families, Etgarim (an organization for youths with special needs) and the Jerusalem Foundation, and is unique in Israel.

"There are many other services for youth at risk, but none like this one," says Dr. Adit Dayan, project co-ordinator for welfare and community programs at the Jerusalem Foundation.

The program's uniqueness stems from its small size, the balance of its student body, the close relationship it aims to strike between students and staff, its attempt to bring parents into the educational fold, and its flexible and highly individualized instruction.

The curriculum combines subjects like mathematics, English and computers with individualized life skills training, practical vocational training and therapy.

"The Neri School is not first and foremost an academic institute," Barzilay says. Most students have to iron out some basic life-coping skills – patience, self-control, self-reliance, co-operation, responsibility – as a precursor to succeeding academically. "We work with very complex cases and our primary goal is rehabilitation, not good marks."

They use many of the resources at Ein Yael to their advantage: the Shvil Center for Therapeutic Riding; the on-site petting zoo, where students look after the animals; the greenhouse and gardening projects; and the Etgarim Park, an obstacle course where companies bring their staff for group-building exercises and students from the Neri School work as guides.

Their success has been overwhelming so far, with graduates going on to complete their high school matriculation, join the Israel Defence Forces, get jobs and become productive citizens. "More importantly," Barzilay says, "they leave with more self-confidence, belief in themselves and their future. That's the greatest measure of our success."

If he had to point to the program's "secret ingredient," Barzilay says, it's that so much of it takes place outdoors. "It's fresh and calming here, and the students feel that."

Every Wednesday is dedicated to nature hikes, and at the end of each school year, students participate in a two-week nature survival trip.

"At this age, this is exactly what they need… to get out into nature, get their energy out and exhaust themselves," Barzilay says.

This "outdoor" philosophy appealed to the the Bloomfield family of Montreal, who funded the construction of the new school. After visiting the Ein Yael Museum campus, Harry Bloomfield pledged the funds to build a new facility.

"We are delighted to be a part of this project," says Bloomfield, whose family's charitable fund, the Eldee Foundation, has subsidized several projects in Israel since it was established in 1961.

The new school, which can accommodate 30 students, is named after Harry's mother, the family matriarch and chair of the Eldee Foundation. Born in 1924, Neri Bloomfield served, among other positions, as National president of Canadian Hadassah-WIZO (1972-76); national president of the Canadian Zionist Federation (1984-87); and president of the Jewish National Fund of Canada (1988-91).

"She is a leading Canadian Zionist," says Bloomfield, whose family received the Jerusalem Foundation's Teddy Kollek Award in May, for its outstanding contributions to the development of the city.

The Neri School was built to compliment the Yaelim Program's nature-centred philosophy. The one-floor building, made of Jerusalem stone, features four small classrooms with large, open windows.

"It was extremely important for us that the new building wouldn't seem like a building," Dayan says. "We didn't want it to look institutional or be confining or interrupt the landscape, but instead to flow organically into the nature that surrounds it."

Israel Briefs

Palestinian state in 2 years

The U.S.-led "Quartet" driving Middle East peace talks gave qualified approval to a Palestinian plan for statehood within two years. "Recalling that transformative change on the ground is integral to peace, the Quartet welcomes the Palestinian Authority's plan for constructing the institutions of the Palestinian state within 24 months as a demonstration of the PA's serious commitment to an independent state that provides opportunity, justice, and security for the Palestinian people and is a responsible neighbour to all states in the region," said the statement issued last week by the grouping of the United States, the European Union, the United Nations and Russia. Israeli officials rejected the two-year plan for statehood proposed last month by PA Prime Minister Salam Fayyad, saying it amounted to a unilateral move.

Olmert trial postponed

Former prime minister Ehud Olmert's graft trial was postponed until February. The former prime minister appeared in Jerusalem District Court last Friday. He faces charges of corruption, related to cash he accepted from U.S. businessman Morris Talansky. He won't face charges of bribery.

Nevzlin to donate $6M

Russian-Israeli businessman Leonid Nevzlin will donate $6 million to the Museum of the Jewish People. Nevzlin, who chairs the international board of governors of Beit Hatfutsot, home of the new museum, announced the donation last week. Nevzlin was the initiator and leading force behind the establishment of the Museum of the Jewish People in Beit Hatfutsot, which will cost an estimated $24 million and is scheduled to be opened in 2012.

Veteran actor keeps busy with The Trotsky and Barney's Version

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

At 61, Saul Rubinek is still one of the busiest actors around. His latest role in The Trotsky received rave reviews during its world première at the Toronto International Film Festival.

In it, the Genie Award winner plays David Bronstein, whose teenage son, Leon (Jay Baruchel), believes he's the Russian revolutionary Leon Trotsky and stands up for workers' rights by staging a hunger strike at his father's Montreal clothing factory.

Rubinek travelled to Montreal to work on the film with fellow Canadian actor and director Jacob Tierney.

"We've known each other a long time. When Jacob was a young actor, I did a movie called Obsessed and he played my son, and I worked with him again in Rainbows in 1991," Rubinek said in a phone interview from Las Vegas, en route from Los Angeles to New York, where he's moving.

"The Trotsky is Jacob's film – he wrote and directed it. It was a delightful script, and I really wanted to see what it would be like to work with Jay Baruchel who's a fine young actor."

Born in a refugee camp in Germany to Holocaust survivors in 1948, Rubinek began acting after his family moved from Montreal to Ottawa when he was six.

"My English wasn't that great, but I spoke a lot of Yiddish and French, and I was very shy. Because my father had been in Yiddish theatre in Europe, one of the first things he did was send me to the 'Ottawa Little Theatre' that had a school for children," Rubinek said.

At the school, he was surrounded by other children who made up stories and found ways to tell them. This path appealed to him, and he went on to work with many celebrated actors.

Recently Rubinek starred opposite Jewish actress Lainie Kazan in the comedy Oy Vey! My Son is Gay!! about Martin and Shirley Hirsch, who try to come to grips with their son's homosexuality after failed attempts to fix him up with a nice Jewish girl.

"It's a delightful movie about old-fashioned Jewish parents who don't know their son is gay. My character's confronted with his homophobia and his worry with what the neighbours will think – things this upper middle class couple would rather pretend they're beyond," he said.

Although Rubinek thought the premise might be dated, he was drawn to the film, which proved to be an audience favourite with sold-out screenings at its world première at the Montreal World Film Fest in August.

"There was something charming about it, and it gave me an opportunity to work with Lainie Kazan, whom I consider to be a force of nature and a delight to work with. John Lloyd Young who plays my son is an extraordinary actor who won a Tony (award) for his role in Broadway's Jersey Boys," he said.

Rubinek won a Genie Award in 1982 for best actor in a supporting role for his part in Ticket to Heaven.

He's also just back from Rome, where he was working on the film adaptation of Mordechai Richler's Barney's Version, in which he plays Barney's (Paul Giamatti) father-in-law Charnofsky, an Orthodox Jew whose daughter denies she's Jewish. Rubinek is familiar with Barney's Version, as he played Barney Panofsky in CBC's four-part radio show in 2003.

The versatile actor's television performances have included roles on Star Trek The Next Generation, Stargate SG-1 and most memorably as Donny Douglas, Niles' unrefined divorce lawyer and Daphne's boyfriend on the sitcom Frasier.

Saul Rubinek

"I was hired for three shows, and that turned into 17 episodes over two years. Frasier had one of the best casts in television history, and working with Kelsey [Grammer] and the wonderful actors was a blessing and a happenstance."

His current television role is quirky Secret Service agent Artie Nielson on Warehouse 13, which resumes filming in Toronto next March.

Rubinek is also developing projects with his wife, producer Elinor Reid, including a play he wrote called Terrible Advice that's being cast in London and directed by Muppeteer Frank Oz.

Saul Rubinek, left, with Warehouse 13 co-stars Joanne Kelly and Eddie McClintock.

As our interview came to an end, Rubinek recalled the projects inspired by his survivor parents. So Many Miracles is a book he wrote based on interviews about his parents' experiences in hiding with a Polish farmer's family for 2-1/2 years from 1942 to 1945 and includes how Rubinek's parents met, their lives before and after the war and how they came to Montreal.

When the farmer's wife asked to be reunited with Rubinek's parents in Poland in 1987, he wrote and produced the documentary Too Many Miracles, directed by Vic Sarin (A Shine of Rainbows).

"The film was something I could pass on to my children. It's my belief that Jewish children are given way too much information about the Holocaust before they know what to do with it. Certainly I knew about it before I could handle the word genocide," said Rubinek, who showed the film to his children's Grade 8 classes.

"We were able to introduce the subject in the context of other world events in history and have children look into their own backgrounds to see they had great drama, tragedies and miracles in their pasts. Making this documentary made a difference to my life, to my parents and to my children's lives. To be able to pass on the stories to children in the same classroom has been a great mitzvah."

PLANNING FOR RETIREMENT?

L'Shana Tova! "Giving Thanks"

This is the time of year when we reflect on the past year and anticipate the coming year. Very soon we will also give thanks for the abundance we enjoy in our lives – not only for the material necessities and all of the niceties, but also for the good times we spend with family, friends and colleagues who enrich us.

NEW SET OF DEAD SEA SCROLLS ON VIEW AT ROM, OCT. 10 TO JAN. 3

The eight Dead Sea Scrolls that have been on display at the Royal Ontario Museum since late June are due to be replaced by eight other scrolls, complemented as before by full interpretations, translations and background information. The second set of scrolls opens on Oct. 10 and continues through Jan. 3, 2010.

As in the first installation, the second group features two scrolls specially conserved for their ROM appearance, which is their first public display. The biblical scroll of Deuteronomy dates to the first century CE, and the non-biblical Communal Ceremony scroll to about 30 BCE. Both are written in Hebrew and were found in Cave 4 at Qumran in 1952.

Included in the second rotation is a section of Psalms naming King David as its author and demonstrating the ancient tradition of David as the greatest of poets. Dated to the first century BCE, this earliest known copy of the Book of Psalms contains as many as 51 individual psalms.

Also being readied for display is the Papyrus Bar Kokhba 46, a lease agreement written in Mishnaic Hebrew. Dating to 134 CE during the Second Judean Revolt, it mentions Simeon Bar Kosiba (Bar Kokhba), the revolt's principal leader. Another scroll to be shown is the Isaiah scroll (60 CE), full of prophesies including predictions of the end of times, a theme prevalent among Judaic groups in the Second Temple period.

One of the oldest copies of the text of the Ten Commandments is also coming to the ROM. Due to its fragile nature and its sensitivity to light and humidity, the Ten Commandments scroll is scheduled for display for only 80 hours during its weeklong appearance from Oct. 10 to 18.

"Dead Sea Scrolls: Words that Changed the World" is a unique opportunity to view one of the greatest archeological finds of the 20th century – the earliest record of biblical patriarchs and prophets known to Judaism, Christianity and Islam. 416-586-8000, www.rom.on.ca

Israel Film Festival 2: As the Toronto International Film Festival recently demonstrated so well, Israel has a strong and expressive cinema all of its own.

Another opportunity to view some acclaimed Israeli films is approaching: the Israel Film Festival 2, at the Sheppard Grande Cinema, Yonge Street north of Sheppard Avenue, Oct. 18 to 22. The eight films being screened are Eli & Ben, Waltz with Bashir, Ushpizin, Three Mothers, Lost Islands, Bonjour Mr Shlomi, Salt of the Earth and James' Journey to Jerusalem.

Most screenings feature guest speaker Oded Adomi Leshem, an Israeli filmmaker; journalist Ron Ben-Yishai, a key character in Waltz with Bashir, is expected to discuss the film after its screening. Tickets are $13, with a seven-film pass selling for $70. Ticket hotline, 416-231-0029, www.israelfilmfestival.ca.

Names in the News: "With the curtain drawn on this year's Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF), the anti-Israel protestors who sought to demonize and isolate Israel failed completely in their bid to darken the spotlight on Tel Aviv," begins a letter from David Koschitzky, chair of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, who further reports that TIFF's recent City to City film series featuring Tel Aviv was sold out.

Jerry Seinfeld, Lisa Kudrow and Halle Berry were among more than 100 famous personalities who signed "We don't need another blacklist" ads in the Toronto Star, National Post and Variety magazine, sponsored by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles. Israeli films share a tradition of "open, uncensored, artistic expression," the ads correctly pointed out. "Anyone who has actually seen recent Israeli cinema, movies that are political and personal, comic and tragic, often critical, knows they are in no way a propaganda arm for any government policy."

Kudos to all the signators of the ads and their federation sponsors. As we begin the New Year of 5770, let's hope we can buy a bottle of Israeli wine, visit a museum exhibition from Israel, or see an Israeli film in this city without being obliged yet again to defend the Jewish state from a malicious campaign of lies and vilification.

Delicate Lemon Tree is ripe with symbolism

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

If you missed the chance to see Lemon Tree at the last Toronto Jewish Film Festival and during its short run in theatres last May, you should try to find this gem, which has just been released on DVD.

Directed by Eran Riklis, (The Syrian Bride), Lemon Tree tells the moving story of a Palestinian widow who takes the fight to protect her lemon grove all the way to the Supreme Court of Israel.

Hiam Abbass won an Israeli Academy Award for her role as Salma Zidane, who's been tending her family's lemon grove on the border between the West Bank and Israel all her life. As misfortune has it, Israel's hawkish defence minister and his wife are her new neighbours on the other side of the Green Line, and Israel's security forces deem her grove to be a potential site for a terrorist strike and order her trees cut down.

The minister's wife, Mira Navon, played by Rona Lipaz-Michael, is sympathetic to her plight, but realizes there's nothing she can do to convince her husband to let the trees stay.

Zidane doesn't take the government's decision lightly, and she becomes a media sensation when she decides to stand up for her rights.

The movie, ripe with subtle and not-so-subtle symbolism, is delicately and emotionally written and directed by Israeli director Riklis.

While Israel comes across as Goliath to Zidane's David, he doesn't really take sides. The Israelis, after all, do offer her compensation, and when rifle shots are fired towards the minister's house, it's clear that the grove is a threat. The Palestinian Authority is portrayed as a corrupt machine, unwilling to help Zidane.

Based on a true story, the film won an Audience Award at the Berlin Film Festival last year.

The DVD, unfortunately, does not have any special features, other than a French soundtrack and the movie trailer. A commentary soundtrack would have been nice.

Hiam Abass won an Israeli Academy Award for her role as Salma Zidane.

Lebanon's director surprised to receive award in Venice

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Samuel Maoz, the writer and director of Lebanon, the winner of the Venice Film Festival's top award, is still in something of a state of shock.

The critical acclaim his first feature film garnered in Italy was totally unexpected, he disclosed in an interview during the Toronto International Film Festival, where Lebanon was also screened.

A 47-year-old filmmaker from Tel Aviv, he was clearly blindsided by its success.

He was, first of all, surprised that Lebanon – which unfolds primarily in an Israeli tank in the first harrowing hours of the 1982 war in Lebanon – was accepted by the Venice festival.

Still more, he was surprised that it won the Golden Lion award. "This, for me, was the big prize, a special moment," he said.

After the first screening, he choked up. "I had lost my tears, but when the crowd applauded, tears came into my eyes," said Maoz.

In capturing the Golden Lion, he beat out a director from Iran, whose Islamic government defames Israel and opposes its very existence.

Nonetheless, the Iranian agreed to pose for a photograph with Maoz, and this pleased him to no end.

Apart from being shocked by Lebanon's reception at Venice, Maoz was taken aback by the ease with which he was able to raise funds – $1.5 million in U.S. currency – to shoot it.

"I guess investors liked the script," said Maoz, who previously worked as a production designer in film and television and directed documentaries, a TV series and plays.

As well, Maoz was pleasantly surprised by some audience reaction.

In Venice, a woman hardly disposed toward Israel complimented him and admitted that the film had changed her fundamental perception of Israel.

In Toronto, a Syrian and a Palestinian hugged him, saying they could empathize with the death of Israeli soldiers on the battlefield.

Lebanon combines fact with fiction.

The tank they manned entered not one but several hostile Lebanese villages and got as far as Beirut.

Shmulik, the gunner in the tank, is based on Maoz himself.

The seedy member of the Phalange – the pro-Israel Lebanese Christian militia – who pops into the tank is not a figment of his imagination. In real life, he reeked of alcohol and was not trustworthy. Indeed, he led the Israelis into an ambush near Beirut in which Maoz's World War II vintage Patton was surrounded by 11 Syrian tanks.

Some of the Syrian tankists, armed with knives, left their tank and tried to kill the Israelis.

"It was horrible. I thought I was going to die."

Much to his relief, the Syrians could not open the hatch and fled after an Israeli jet roared toward them.

Lebanon, which was scheduled to open in Israel at the end of September, was filmed in 33 days, with interior scenes shot in a Tel Aviv studio and exterior ones near Kfar Sava.

It was a difficult shoot, he said. "It was very hard to do. The actors were in an extreme situation, in fire and smoke."

Maoz had no political views about the war in Lebanon when it broke out. "I was just a kid," he said.

But in retrospect, he thinks it evolved into a quagmire. "It was our Vietnam. Lebanon was nothing but trouble."

To his satisfaction, Lebanon has been bought by distributors in several European countries.

Distributors in North America have been eager to buy it, too.

Emboldened by its success, Maoz has begun writing the script for his second film.

"I'm very hungry to make more films, and I'm sure I'll make my next one very soon. I'm full of adrenalin."

He cannot as yet discuss its theme, but says it is not on the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Asked his opinion of the so-called Toronto Declaration, signed by critics of Israel who opposed the festival's City to City program focusing on Tel Aviv, Maoz said, "I didn't agree with it. Filmmakers are supposed to be above these things. It was a mistake, that's for sure."

Alberta town lives long and prospers

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VULCAN, Alta.— If you want to brush up on your Klingon, Vulcan is the place to do it.

Vulcan, Alta., that is.

The small farming community of 2,000 was facing extinction back when Star Trek first appeared on TV screens worldwide in the 1960s. Many of its grain elevators had succumbed to fire or been torn down and town residents were concerned the town wouldn't be around much longer.

That's when they started noticing a few visitors showing up for a photo opportunity with their town name in the background. In 1910, a railway surveyor in Alberta had given this small outpost the name Vulcan after the Roman god of forge and fire, never suspecting the name would find a fictional parallel half a century later. Star Trek had inadvertently secured the future of Vulcan, and it seemed an opportune time for the town to capitalize on its name.

You have to drive through miles of rolling canola, wheat and barley fields to find Vulcan today, but once you do, the spaceship-shaped visitors' centre is an undeniable sign that you've arrived. Built in 1998, the centre has welcomed Star Trek fans by the thousands, people who travel from far and wide to feed their Trek addiction.

One couple married in the centre in a strictly Klingon ceremony. Another man chose the Vulcan cemetery as his final resting place, requesting a tombstone that recalls his love of everything Trek-related.

This year marked the 16th annual Star Trek convention in Vulcan, a weekend that witnessed some 10,000 Trek fans descend on the small farming community. Half of them made their way through the visitors' centre, shopping for memorabilia that includes everything from clothes to water pistols to Spock-like ears.

But it's not just convention-goers that stop in at Vulcan. Last year 17,000 visitors came through town and this year, with the launch of the new Star Trek movie in May 2009 that number is expected to rise to 20,000. "The new movie has created a whole new Star Trek fan base," says Erin Melcher, the visitors' centre co-ordinator. "We're getting younger Trek enthusiasts now, and Star Trek is more popular than ever."

Visitors can don Star Trek clothes, and pose on the bridge for photographs with lifesize cardboard cutouts of their favourite characters. For a $10 fee they can also play Vulcan Space Adventure, a $250,000 virtual reality game wherein they train as space cadets and try to save Earth from alien invaders. "Shop lifters will be vaporized," store signage cautions playfully.

In downtown Vulcan, a handful of businesses have started embracing the Star Trek theme. The post office has a spaceship cancellation stamp for mail, there's a Star Trek mural on the pharmacy and a Star Trek-themed water park. Even the historic Vulcan Hotel has a Star Trek-themed room.

Most visitors leave with a pair of pointy, distinctly Star Trek ears, for Vulcan is the only place you can procure them. Before they hit the highway to Calgary, many give the Vulcan salute meaning "live long and prosper," which, interestingly, has Jewish roots.

In the priestly blessing performed by Jewish Kohanim, they use both hands thumb to thumb to form the Hebrew letter Shin. It stands for Shaddai, which means Almighty. As a child, actor Leonard Nimoy, who plays the half-Vulcan character Mr. Spock in the original series, was fascinated by the blessings he saw in the Orthodox synagogue he attended with his grandfather. He recalled those blessings in the Vulcan salute, recreating it with a one-handed greeting that's oft-used today by Star Trek fans.

Birdwatchers from all over the world are expected in the Israeli resort town of Eilat for the 4th Eilat Spring Migration Festival next March.

Israel's location on the only land bridge between Europe, Asia and Africa makes it uniquely suited as a prime bird-watching site for a large variety of migratory birds. Eilat is "one of the world's prime bird-watching locations," said Arie Sommer, Israel's tourism commissioner for North and South America. Visitors may witness the migration of more than 500 million birds including rare raptors, pelicans and cranes.

Scheduled for March 18 to 25, 2010, the week-long festival will feature day and night birding tours, workshops, an opening banquet and evening activities at the Isrotel Agamim Hotel. Details at www.goisrael.com.

The United States was the top source of tourists to Israel, followed by Russia, Britain and France. Tourism officials partly attributed the upturn to the growing number of flights from North America to Israel by such carriers as El Al, US Airways, Continental, Delta and Air Canada.

A conversation about poetry

By TOBY SALTZMAN
Special to The CJN

Although Erica Jong rose to literary stardom with the scandalous novel Fear of Flying – the tale of a flighty woman's erotic desires and rush to freedom – she is first and foremost a poet.

Earlier this year, following the publication of 20 books, including poetry, fiction, non-fiction and her biography, Seducing the Demon, Penguin published an eclectic collection of poems, Love Comes First. The poems speak of profound issues of current relevance. They are brilliant, focusing on Jong's metaphorical views of love, life, death, nature and the Holocaust, as well as her love of mythology and travel.

By a stroke of luck, I recently met the vivacious Jong and her gentle husband, Ken Burrows, on a transatlantic crossing aboard the grand Queen Mary 2, where she appeared as a guest lecturer on a literary-themed cruise. Over coffee in the Princess Grill lounge, the writer – ever glamorous though still clad in gym togs after exercising, her sparkling eyes animated by laugh lines under a froth of blond hair – spoke candidly about her inspiration for her evocative poems.

"These poems, written individually over 10 years, are indicative of themes of decades in my life," Jong said. "Now, in my 50s and 60s, when losses start to pile up, people [like me] must make sense of our own mortality."

The book is divided into three sections. The first part, titled "You Are Here," portrays her rapture on seeing a flying hawk and the ache at the death of a friend. Of the poem Wishing for Angels, Jong says, "Our culture is searching for the meaning of life. I believe kindness is the highest act you can perform. My angels are the truth tellers, people who tell the truth through the art of language, dance, music."

In the second section, "People Who Can't Sleep," The God of the Chimneys poses the haunting questions, "For what angry God… have we given our eyes, our teeth, our eyeglasses, bales of hair, and the magic of worthless gold?" and "For what atonement do we walk again and again into the oven?"

"In my 20s, I started to wonder what is this need to kill Jews. Was it because of the Ten Commandments, Mosaic laws which we imposed on people who weren't ready for it?" Jong said.

Her voice turned hard when she recalled her inspiration for When a Jew Kills a Jew – a poem that harks to Cain and Abel, Judas and Jesus. "Few of my poems are inspired by political events, but I was away promoting Fear of 50 when [prime minister] Yitzhak Rabin was assassinated by an angry fundamentalist, and I started scribbling these lines, 'Without the law, without our brothers, what is a Jew, but a convert hiding from the light.'"

Of the poems that make up "People Who Can't Sleep," Jong said, "There's a certain separate consciousness that goes with being Jewish, even if you are secular."

The final section of Love Comes First, "Aphrodite's Laughter," is devoted to Jong's mischievous muse, the Greek goddess of love and beauty.

Jong's conversation is peppered with quotes from the likes of Sappho and Sartre to Isaac Bashevis Singer. I was smitten by her literary intelligence.

Why did she pen her thoughts and ideals in poetry? "People think poetry is superfluous until someone they love dies, or until we fall in love, or a baby or grandchild is born. Then they see that poetry is the most intense expression that we have in words to celebrate or mourn," she said.

A portrait of King Hussein of Jordan

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

King Hussein of Jordan negotiated the dangerous shoals of Arab politics, escaped a succession of assassination attempts, fought a civil war with the Palestinians, and maintained a covert dialogue with Israel until he finally signed a peace treaty with the Jewish state in 1994. He has been the subject of a torrent of biographies, some of which have been published since his death a decade ago. But King Hussein of Jordan: A Political Life (Yale University Press), by British historian Nigel Ashton, is the first to draw on his private papers. Ashton, a senior lecturer at the London School of Economics and Political Science, has used the opportunity to write an accessible and generally sympathetic account of King Hussein's turbulent reign, which ended in the winter of 1999 with his death.

The king, who ascended to the Hashemite throne at the age of 17 after his mentally ill father was deemed unfit to hold office, was often confronted by issues relating to Israel, his much more powerful neighbour shunned by the Arab world. Citing an example, Ashton refers to an Israeli raid that he correctly describes as "a key landmark on the road to war."

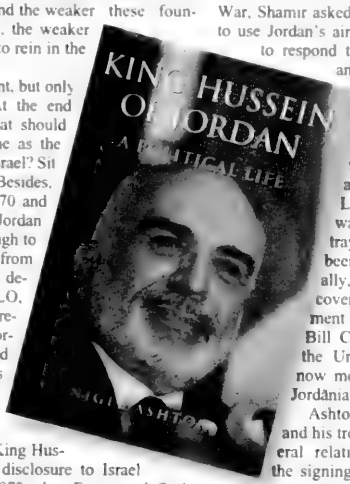
In the autumn of 1966, less than a year before the Six Day War, Syria stepped up its campaign to destabilize Jordan by backing Palestinian raids against Israel. Six of those attacks were launched from Jordanian soil, and one of them claimed the lives of three Israeli soldiers. By way of retaliation, Israel sent an infantry brigade, backed by tanks, artillery and air cover, into the Jordanian village of Samu.

King Hussein, having had started secret contacts with Israel in the early 1960s, felt betrayed by the raid. He told Israeli interlocutors that he could not "absorb" such a "serious" retaliatory blow. Ashton sympathizes with the king, but fails to explain why Israel should have exercised restraint in the face of blatant aggression.

Ashton believes that King Hussein's decision to attack Israel in the Six Day War was "the greatest calamity of his reign." As he points out, the king was misled by his ally, Egypt, which claimed that three-quarters of Israel's army in the Sinai Peninsula had been destroyed. As a result of its colossal error, Jordan lost much of its armoured force, as well as the West Bank, which had accounted for about 40 per cent of its gross domestic product.

King Hussein was prepared to make peace with Israel in exchange for a complete Israeli withdrawal from the West Bank, but Israel was only ready only for a partial pullback.

During the postwar period, when Jordan became one of the front lines in Israel's military struggle with the Arabs, King Hussein was caught in the middle. As Ashton puts it, "The more Israel punished Jordan for incursions on the part of Palestinian guerrilla groups, the weaker the foundations of his rule became. And the weaker these foundations became, the weaker was his ability to rein in the fedayeen."



He has a point, but only to a degree. At the end of the day, what should Israel have done as the PLO pounded Israel? Sit on its hands? Besides, as events in 1970 and 1971 showed, Jordan was strong enough to eject the PLO from its territory. In defeating the PLO, King Hussein restored his authority, but damaged his relations with his fellow Arabs.

Ashton's interpretation of King Hussein's startling disclosure to Israel on Sept. 25, 1973, that Egypt and Syria intended to launch the Yom Kippur War seems plausible. The king apparently hoped to forestall a new round of fighting and persuade Israel to make genuine concessions for the sake of peace. But by late September, the die for war was already cast. He adds that King Hussein tried to fend off Egyptian and Syrian requests for Jordanian participation in the Yom Kippur War, but when he could stall no longer, he limited Jordan's involvement.

Ashton discloses that, in a step toward peace in 1974, Jordan offered Israel a proposal in which both sides would pull back eight kilometres from the Jordan River and Jordan would reestablish its rule in the area vacated by the Israelis. Israel rejected that idea.

According to Ashton, King Hussein publicly welcome Anwar Sadat's 1977 rapprochement with Israel but privately condemned it because he had not been notified in advance. Nor did he like Israel's 1978 Camp David accord with Egypt. From his perspective, it was too vague on the Palestinian issue.

Ashton is skeptical that King Hussein's 1987 agreement with Shimon Peres – then Israel's foreign minister – was "a great missed opportunity" to advance peace. Since Israel's prime minister of the day, Yitzhak Shamir, was scathing of Peres' approach, it was effectively a still-born agreement.

His assessment of the king's alliance with Saddam Hussein on the eve of Iraq's invasion of Kuwait is harsh: "The king's faith in Saddam was probably the biggest character misjudgment of his reign."

Having refused to join Egypt in the peace process, King Hussein entered the Arab rejectionist camp, led by Iraq. Why? Jordan was dependent on its lucrative commercial relationship with Iraq and Iraq's generous subsidies, totalling more than $1 billion per annum. Further, he believed that Saddam's leadership could restore Arab pride and dignity. What a miscalculation!

Prior to the outbreak of the 1991 Gulf War, Shamir asked the king for permission to use Jordan's airspace in case Israel had to respond to Iraqi aggression. The answer was a resounding no. The king said he could not be seen colluding with Israel.

King Hussein's reaction to Israel's 1993 Oslo accords with the Palestine Liberation Organization was one of anger and betrayal because he had not been consulted. But eventually, he regarded Oslo as a cover to reach a peace agreement with Israel. As he wrote Bill Clinton, the president of the United States: "We shall now move on our own on the Jordanian-Israeli agenda."

Ashton's chapter on this topic, and his treatment of Israel's bilateral relations with Jordan after the signing of the peace treaty, is comprehensive.

King Hussein was of the view that, in Yitzhak Rabin, the Israeli prime minister, he had a reliable and trustworthy partner who had internalized the need for peace.

Yet the king was not prepared to take the risk of officially recognizing Israel until he was given certain economic and military benefits by the United States. Rabin appointed Efraim Halevy, a top-ranking Mossad official who was close to the king, to act on Jordan's behalf in Washington. He convinced the White House to cancel Jordan's $700-million debt and sell Jordan a squadron of F-16 jets. Israel's position prompted Dennis Ross, the U.S. envoy to the Mideast, to exclaim, "Tell me, Efraim, who are you representing here? Israel or Jordan?" Halevy said, "Both."

As Ashton tells it, King Hussein was genuinely grief-stricken by Rabin's assassination. In a eulogy at his funeral, he called Rabin "a brother" and "a friend." Yet King Hussein's relationship with his successors, Peres and Benjamin Netanyahu, was cool by comparison. He claimed that Peres had used disproportionate force in the 1996 Grapes of Wrath operation in southern Lebanon. As for Netanyahu, he accused him of undermining peace talks with the Palestinian Authority and of violating Jordan's sovereignty by sending a Mossad hit team to Amman in 1997 to kill a Hamas leader, Khaled Meshal.

Perhaps Ashton's most astonishing revelation turns on a short-lived initiative undertaken by Rabin in the year he was killed. Rabin asked King Hussein to wangle an invitation from Saddam to visit Baghdad and establish relations with Iraq. Saddam did not rule out Rabin's overture, but an Iraqi internal crisis rendered it impossible.

Crumbling cemetery in Florence waiting to be restored

BY MARCIE BEYATTE
Special to The CJN

Eighteen-year-old Vera Bolaffio might have been known for her wit, her waist-length ebony hair or her talent as a poet. But her story ended in August 1944 in Florence, Italy, when a German grenade struck her while she was searching for drinking water just eight months before Liberation Day.

She is known today only because she was the last person to be buried in the old Jewish cemetery in Florence.

The old cemetery had been closed for 60 years but reopened its gates for Vera's interment in 1944 because the new cemetery was outside the city centre and deemed unsafe during the last days of the war.

Vera Bolaffio's grave stone. [M. Beyatte photos]

Visiting cemeteries is how I learn about the history of the places I go to. I am comfortable among the dead. A portrait gallery of my ancestors graces my dining room walls. I can imagine their lives and dreams without any messy interactions, unlike some of my living relatives. When the dead refuse to talk to me, at least they have a good excuse.

The old Jewish cemetery where I discovered Bolaffio's weed-shrouded tombstone is just outside the San Frediano gate on Viale Ludovico Ariosto, near one of my favourite restaurants, Trattoria Sabatino. I've walked by the cemetery's graffiti-covered concrete walls dozens of times, unaware of what lay behind the gates.

Recently, a small historic marker identifying the cemetery caught my eye. I learned that it's open only on the first Sunday morning of the month from 10 a.m. to noon and it costs three euros to enter. The sign also informed me that the cemetery was founded in 1777 and closed in 1880, when a bigger site opened in Rifredi on Via Delle Cacciolle. Another sign announced that the cemetery was going to be restored by the city of Florence in co-operation with the Jewish community of Florence.

While I was mentally translating all this Italian into English, a man drove up on a scooter and unlocked the rusty green metal gate. I asked if I could enter.

In a thick Italian accent, he said, "Sorry, signora, I have absolutely nothing to do with the cemetery. I'm just an architect who rents some office space here."

I snaked my neck around him to catch a glimpse inside, curious to see what one could rent in a cemetery. It was a cozy red-brick cottage with weather-beaten white wicker furniture on the porch. Maybe I could get on the waiting list and live there one day.

I locked eyes with the architect; I was ready to beg for admittance.

He paused. He shrugged his shoulders, a gesture so uniquely Italian, ushered me through the creaking gate and invited me to take a quick look around.

I entered a walled verdant garden splashed with yellow buttercups and red poppies surrounding the headstones.

The headstones resembled overturned dominoes. I grazed the surface of one of the graves and touched a tombstone with my fingers. The surface was pocked and rough, and the concrete crumbled in my hand. A grey and white cat hiding behind the grave pounced, and missed, a yellow butterfly. Fragments of white marble crunched under my feet. Bullet holes fractured the marble on some of the headstones, a reminder of when the Nazis paid a visit. I hurried through the cemetery snapping pictures, trying not to take advantage of my kind host.

I returned to the cemetery a few weeks later, the first Sunday of April. I waited alone at the gate for the tour leader. Yael arrived and told me she was a graduate art-history student from Israel who hoped to help with the restoration by translating the Hebrew inscriptions on the gravestones into Italian.

"There isn't money to keep the cemetery open more than once a month," she says. "Not many people come to visit."

After the war, local Christians tried to clean up the destruction created by the Nazis. Yael pointed out some headstones that were "replanted" upside down because these Good Samaritans couldn't read Hebrew.

Yael introduced me to Bolaffio. Her grave stands out because it is newer white marble and the words are clear. The inscription on the stone, translated from Italian, is: "Here rests in peace Vera Bolaffio/ Snatched away by a German grenade/ from the affection of those who loved her/ On August 28, 1944/ At the age of eighteen."

"We know very little of Vera's life," Yael told me. "She was born in Trieste, but escaped with her family to hide in Florence during the war. Her father tended her monument until he returned to Trieste. He paid someone to take care of her grave until he passed away."

Dandelions and buttercups were growing around Bolaffio's resting place when I visited. Time has yet to erode her short story and leaves us a few clues as to who she was. But it is who she might have been, had she lived, that fascinates me.

Cypress trees line the central pathway. I imagine the black-clad mourners arriving in horse-driven carriages and can hear the crunch of their boots on the white gravel as they walk in a line to the grave site, sobbing into their linen handkerchiefs. A wooden coffin is unloaded, and the mourners gather in a tight group to sway to the mourner's Kaddish.

Today, red poppies grow over the broken stones, and stories go untold and forgotten, maybe forever. There are no visitors to place pebbles on the graves of their loved ones, letting them know they are remembered.

As I slowly walked back out the rusty gates and onto the bustling streets of Florence, I promised myself, I would find out more about Bolaffio.

Basketball player retires with his kippah on

By SHAUN FELDMAN
Special to The CJN

After seven years playing professional basketball, Tamir Goodman is hanging up his jersey.

On Sept. 15, the 27-year-old point guard, who made history as not only the first pro basketball player to wear a kippah on the court but also the first never to play on Shabbat, announced his retirement from Israel's pro league due to multiple injuries sustained over his career.

Goodman, once dubbed "The Jewish Jordan" by Sports Illustrated, makes it very clear, however, that this is far from the end of his basketball career. In fact, the second phase of his journey has only just begun, as he turns his attention toward the multiple charities, camps and clinics he has set up to help special needs kids and underprivileged Jewish youth, including Haifa Hoops for Kids and the Tamir Goodman Athletic Leadership Basketball Camp.

Goodman was in Toronto recently to deliver a public address on the topic, "A Story of Faith." He will return next spring for a three-on-three tournament to raise money for the Hoops For Kids program.

Ever since he watched his older brother, Reuven, play for his high school basketball team, Goodman knew he wanted to get into the sport. He considered playing basketball somewhat of a religious experience, stating that, as he matured, it was his way to "sanctify HaShem" through being a positive role model for others.

"I just tried to be the absolute best player that I could be, but at the same time tried to always be the best Jew that I could be," he said. "And as I get older, I realize that it's all one thing – you're not just Jewish when you go to shul and a different person when you go to work."

Following his high school basketball stint, he accepted a scholarship to play for the University of Maryland, but due to the coach's insistence that he play on Shabbat, he was forced to transfer to lesser-known Towson University.

It was at Towson that Goodman made sports history, convincing the league to rearrange its schedule and becoming the first Division 1 basketball player to never play on Shabbat and the major Jewish holidays.

After moving to Israel in 2002, Goodman played for several Israeli teams, including Maccabi Tel Aviv and Maccabi Shoham. He also served in the Israeli Defence Forces before returning to the United States in 2007 to play for the Maryland Nighthawks of the Premier Basketball League for one year.

He returned to Israel to play his final pro season with the Haifa Heat in 2008. Goodman said he'll remember that season as the culmination of many fruitful years in the sport.

"It was such a blessing to end my career there, because my career was basically about fighting for Shabbat, fighting for kosher food, fighting for Judaism in many ways. And Maccabi Haifa was just such a professional team… just the way they treat you, the way they respect you and just what they're trying to do off the court and on the court, through basketball. I just felt so at home."

As much as he would still love to be able to play, Goodman sees his basketball career as merely the first phase in a life of motivating others to follow their dreams and realize their goals.

"My body has come back from three career-ending injuries – two major injuries in my knee and one in my hand. I had nine major injuries in the last 10 years, so now I'm at the point where I physically can't play anymore, but it really fell right into place with Maccabi Haifa and phase two of my life, which is to create a school to help everyone else and to inspire everyone else," he said.

Tamir Goodman

Goodman announced his retirement at the Jewish Children's Museum in Brooklyn. The museum was dedicated to the memory of Ari Halberstam, a yeshiva student and fellow basketball player who was murdered 15 years ago by an Arab gunman on the Brooklyn Bridge in apparent retribution for a massacre of 29 Arabs by Jewish doctor Baruch Goldstein days earlier at a mosque in Hebron.

According to Goodman, the museum supports the very same philanthropic work he will be conducting over the second part of his career.

"When there's a tragedy, Judaism teaches us that we fight back with light," he said. "So, the greatest thing we can do in [Halberstam's] memory is announce our charity work and all the good that we're doing."

"I don't just look at basketball as a game. I know how much good it can do. I know how basketball can get special needs kids to have the time of their life.

"I've been around basketball my whole life and it's a very, very powerful tool that can be used in a very, very positive way, and I feel like it's my mission to do it."

Goodman says he's grateful that all of his hard work and loyalty to his beliefs have paid off and that others have taken notice as well, a fact that he considers the ultimate kiddush HaShem.

"I'd say the best basketball compliment I ever got was last year when my coach just came up to me one day and said 'You know what, I scouted all the players in Europe and around the world [and] you're the hardest worker I've ever met in my life.' My drive was so strong because I wanted to show the world that I could do this with my kippah on."

Israel gets Chile in Davis Cup draw

By NIR WOLF
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Yom Kippur, September 2007. Israel's Davis Cup team is fighting impossible odds. Dudi Sela stuns Fernando Gonzalez, and Israel beats Chile to gain promotion to the World Group. A new era begins in Israeli tennis.

For two years, the Chileans have been haunted by that embarrassing defeat and have been out for revenge ever since. Last week they got their chance when the draw for the first round of the 2010 Davis Cup was made in Geneva – and again pitted Israel against Chile in a match to take place in March. This time, however, the tie will be played on South American clay.

"Of course we remember that defeat," said Chile's non-playing captain, Hans Goldmeister. "It was an extremely painful loss and it's impossible to forget. But this time we'll be playing in Santiago, and it will be a very different story."

So while the Chileans were smiling, the Israeli team was left to look for a silver lining. "We're playing in the World Group and any team we drew against would have been tough," said Israeli captain Eyal Ran.

"But then again, we could have drawn Switzerland with Roger Federer, Serbia with Novak Djokovic or even France, so drawing Chile really isn't so bad. But it's still a tough prospect. Chile is the favourite and there's nothing we can do to change that. In the World Group, you need to play above yourself to progress. If we play the kind of tennis we usually do, we won't beat anyone. But if we raise our game like we did against Sweden and Russia, we can pull off a surprise, even on clay."

The clay surface, which was a contributory factor in Israel's recent semifinal loss to Spain, is slightly less intimidating this time around. "The tie against Spain will certainly benefit us," said doubles specialist Andy Ram. "If we managed not to disgrace ourselves on clay against the best tennis nation in the world, we can only take encouragement from that. The worst is already behind us."

According to Ram, "Chile is the kind of team that plays best in front of its passionate supporters, and it will be highly motivated to beat us and to avenge the defeat in 2007. We will learn the lessons from our loss in Spain. We already know, for example, that we must play at least one tournament on clay before we travel to South America. Harel Levy's last tournament before the Spain tie was on clay, and he adjusted better than anyone else to the unfamiliar surface. On the first day, he played superbly and was unlucky to lose. He then went on to win his next game."

The Israeli team hopes to hold a training camp after the Israeli Championships in December. If Israel is victorious in Santiago, the next stop on the Davis Cup tour will also be overseas, against the winner of the tie between Belgium and the Czech Republic. And if anyone needs reminding, the Czech Republic has already booked its place in this year's final.

It's not the 'flu' – it's influenza

By MICHAEL GORDON

Reports first came out of Mexico in April about swine flu, or more accurately H1N1.

As the number of cases mounted and the World Health Organization issued releases about the potential for a world-wide flu outbreak, or pandemic, the media reported on it daily and caused a great deal of concern.

However, when it became clear that most people who contracted H1N1 had mild cases, the public became bored with stories about the flu and the risks entailed in this flu outbreak. Excessive media coverage may have done an inadvertent disservice to public health officials who were trying to prepare the public for the upcoming flu season.

The Senior Side of Life

As a teenager growing up in Brooklyn, I contracted Asian flu and recall how terribly ill I was. I was in bed for a week with high fevers and excruciating muscle pains. The Asian influenza outbreak of 1957-58 was followed by the Hong Kong outbreak in 1968-69. In both outbreaks, it is estimated that hundreds of thousands, if not more, succumbed to the illness directly or indirectly, due to underlying illnesses worsened by the infection.

One problem with raising the public's awareness of the potential seriousness of such outbreaks is that we have tended to use the term "flu" for a disease that rightfully should be called influenza. The term "flu" is used almost dismissively for almost any type of viral infections, many of which are minor in nature and have nothing to do with influenza.

Sometimes health-care professionals will describe non-specific illnesses with fever and respiratory symptoms as the "flu," and since these illnesses are usually not serious, the whole idea of the potentially catastrophic nature of true influenza is lost.

When people are told to get flu shots, even by public health officials, a false sense of security about influenza being relatively innocuous may be perpetuated. People who refuse the vaccine often say, "I never get the flu," or "Last year, I got the needle and got the flu anyway, so what good did it do?" Then there is always the story about someone they knew or heard of who got a flu shot and got sick or died or was paralyzed, or had some other perceived and often unsubstantiated disaster befall them.

What is the swine flu and what has it to do with the usual "flu," and what should everyone do about it? The most important point for the public and health-care professionals to understand is that using the term "the flu," especially when it is preceded by "it's just," is misleading. Influenza is a serious and potentially lethal disease. The influenza outbreak of 1918 following World War I killed more people than that terrible war itself.

The development of influenza vaccine during World War II, and its improvements subsequently, have been among the great advances in medicine. We are fortunate in Canada because the vaccine is readily available to the population, and in some provinces such as Ontario, it is available without cost to everyone. Manufacturers are trying to include H1N1 strain in next year's vaccine repertoire, so that we can decrease its risk on our population.

So remember, it's not the "flu" – it's influenza – get the "shot" and encourage everyone in your family to do the same.

Feeding our children

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Most kids, at some point, will be picky eaters. But as parents, we take the responsibility of feeding our children seriously and feel this is one area that we can control. We may feel we are "failing" in this area when children refuse to eat what we think they should.

However, we need to take control only in buying healthy foods that appeal to kids, and in modelling good eating and lifestyle behaviours. We can't control our children's appetites, genetics or taste preferences. So, stop trying to decide when kids should be hungry, how much they must eat and what they should like.

I have seen parents follow children around, forcing food into their mouths while the kids are turning away, clearly signaling that they aren't hungry. The kids may even cry or flail around when forced to eat. Unless your child is failing to thrive and not meeting regular developmental milestones, you should never resort to these tactics, which lead to resentment and unhappiness for all parties.

Kids are born with an innate, miraculous ability to know when they are hungry and when they are not, but many parents erase that essential ability that will help them have a lifetime of healthy weights by insisting that they ignore their cues of hunger and satiety but let the parent decide when and how much they should eat. This often leads to obesity.

As adults, we experience times when we are more hungry, or less. So do our kids. With good intentions, parents insist that kids eat – but is the food too much? Are the kids simply not hungry?

I don't recommend that we allow our kids to never eat, and I am aware that left to their own devices, some kids would choose that option, but we have to be realistic about our expectations, listen to the child, read body language and re-evaluate the struggles.

The splendour of the sukkah

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The sukkah that we build for the holiday of Sukkot – the holiday of booths – is a marvelous, desert-like home that takes us into a world of spiritual wonder.

URBAN WRITER

Bees swarm about the ceiling, through the schach (the bamboo sticks, pine branches or wood used to make the roof), and sometimes swoop down on our plates searching for a nibble of carrot tzimmes.

The walls of the sukkah are covered in special decorations meant to remind us of the Jews, our ancestors, after their exile from Egypt. It is on Sukkot that we step outside our homes and eat and sleep in this makeshift dwelling, just as the Jews of the desert did.

I remember as a child welcoming guests into our quaint sukkah and taking great pride in the knots on the old wood, the rusty hook on the door – the one that protected us from the dangerous wildlife (the cat next store).

I asked friends and colleagues to share with me their memories of the sukkah.

Robyn Tousson, a community worker, said this year will be the first time she, her husband, Coby, and their exquisite little boy, Lev, will have their own sukkah. Mazel tov!

"One of things Coby and I were most excited about when we bought our house was to have our very own sukkah and invite family and friends to enjoy it with us," she said.

Robyn added that the most striking sukkah she has ever seen was one built by staff and volunteers of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, a few years ago in the backyard of fellow community member Dalia Margalit.

"It was a lot of work, with some obstacles, but lo and behold, it was one of the most beautiful sukkot I have ever seen," Robyn said.

"We hung white fabric for the walls and had the volunteers paint images of tikkun olam [repairing the world] as the decorations. We used psychedelic fabric made for a rockin' front door. For me, the feeling of the afternoon was truly one of community, family and gratitude for our many gifts and opportunities to do tikkun olam. I was flying high that day."

My niece, Deena Levenstein, a hero in our family for her global citizenship, told me, "Oh, I love Sukkot."

She added that Sukkot is a time when the Jewish people experience great change, "eating outside instead of in the dining room." Deena loves the ambiance of the sukkah and feels that just sitting in it, eating with family and friends and talking Torah "is really special.

"It sounds funny, but actually, just looking at a sukkah or standing or sitting inside one – or even thinking about one makes me feel happy and excited."

The mitzvah of the sukkah is really to live in it, and there are community members who actually do. Sarah Zelcer, a new mom and international development professional told me, "When I was young, we would build a sukkah every year in our backyard made of fiberglass walls. My sisters and I used to sleep inside the sukkah, and my parents would sleep on the couch just inside the house to keep a watchful eye on us. The next morning, our shul would invite all the kids who had slept in the sukkah to the bimah to lead the prayer Adon Olam."

The sukkah is one of the earthiest Jewish rituals. If you haven't built one before, consider it. If you are planning on it, invite us over. We would love to drop by. Chag Samayach. Happy Sukkot. Next year, we should all live indoors.

World to Tehran: 'Take swift action'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Iran's recent revelation that it had covertly built a second nuclear facility led to a flurry of international diplomatic activity last week.

Representatives from Russia, China, France, the United Kingdom, the United States and Germany held an emergency meeting in Geneva on Oct. 1 and 2 with Iranian diplomats to stress the West's growing impatience and concern with Iran's continuing obfuscation surrounding its nuclear program.

Canada 'deeply troubled' by Iran

Saying that the United States and its UN Security Council partners are no longer "interested in talking for the sake of talking," U.S. President Barack Obama last week called on Iran to take "swift action" to demonstrate its nuclear program is peaceful.

Though Canada was not at the meeting – it is not a UN Security Council member – Foreign Minister Lawrence Cannon said last week that Iran has to "stop its pattern of concealment and follow the same rules as the rest of the world."

Iran continues to assert its nuclear program is peaceful. But it recently test-fired medium- and long-range missiles in a show of defiance against western demands that it prove it is in compliance with the international nuclear non-proliferation treaty.

On Sunday, a report released by the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA) found that Iran has acquired "sufficient information to be able to design and produce a workable" atom bomb.

Similar conclusions were reached by Israeli intelligence teams this summer.

The IAEA report, titled Possible Military Dimensions of Iran's Nuclear Program, emphasized that its conclusions were "tentative and subject to further confirmation of the evidence, which it says came from intelligence agencies and its own investigations."

In a statement last month, Prime Minister Stephen Harper said Canada was "deeply troubled" by Iran's Sept. 25 announcement to the IAEA that it had secretly been building its second uranium enrichment facility for several years near the city of Qom. The other, in Natanz, was made public in 2002.

"This is especially worrisome considering the continuous repugnant statements by the president of Iran," Harper said, adding that he hoped last week's Geneva talks would "address the continued dishonesty surrounding Iran's nuclear program. Canada has been very clear. We will be very supportive of whatever actions are necessary to deal with threats to acquire nuclear weapons."

Barak Warrant Nixed

LONDON — A London judge last week rejected a call to issue an arrest warrant against Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak. He was in Britain to speak at the British Labour Party's annual conference at an event for the Labour Friends of Israel lobby. The lawsuit for an international arrest warrant was filed Sept. 29. The judge said war crimes allegations against Barak stemming from last winter's Gaza war are well documented, but said she's "satisfied that under customary international law, Mr. Barak has immunity from prosecution as he would not be able to perform his functions efficiently if he were the subject of criminal proceedings in this jurisdiction." The suit was filed on behalf of several Palestinian families, who were victims of Israel's offensive in Gaza. It was based in part on the Goldstone commission's report to the UN, which accused Israel of war crimes and possible crimes against humanity.

Hate Messages Found

NEW YORK — Police are investigating a series of incidents involving the spread of anti-Semitic material in Brooklyn. Last Wednesday morning, residents of the Bay Ridge neighbourhood found hundreds of two-inch signs with the words "Kill Jews" littering a street, the New York Daily News reported. Police said identical signs were found littering other parts of the borough at least two other times last month. A hate crimes unit is investigating.

Anti-Semitism On Rise

MADRID — Anti-Semitism is on the rise in Spain, according to a new Anti-Defamation League report released last week. The report, which was presented to Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Moratinos, points to "more public expressions and greater acceptance of virulent anti-Jewish attitudes" in Spain, including anti-Jewish attitudes during Israel's Gaza military offensive last winter, and anti-Semitic cartoons and articles in Spain's mainstream media. In addition, opinion polls conducted over the past year show a rise in anti-Semitic attitudes.

Conservative Columnist Worked for Nixon

WASHINGTON — William Safire, the conservative speechwriter turned columnist who made an art of at once embracing and poking the Washington D.C., establishment, died Sept. 27 at age 79 of pancreatic cancer at a hospice in Maryland.

Safire was an adman visiting Moscow in 1959 when he made friends with then-vice-president Richard Nixon by setting up a capitalism vs. communism "kitchen debate" between Nixon and Nikita Khrushchev, the Soviet premier. That friendship landed Safire a speechwriter's job in Nixon's White House in 1969. He helped cultivate the image of Nixon – the ex-vice-president and consummate Republican insider – as an outsider to Washington. He coined the phrase "nattering nabobs of negativism" to describe the administration's critics.

From the White House, he leapt in 1973 to the op-ed page of the New York Times, another bastion of the establishment, to become, according to one account, a "hawk among doves." His twice-weekly column, running until 2005, made him a gadfly of Democrats and liberals. He worked the column like a beat reporter and won the 1978 Pulitzer Prize for columns.

Safire is equally remembered as the "On Language" columnist in the New York Times Magazine from 1979 until earlier this year. He loved to plumb the meanings of what had become common usage and seemed to take special pleasure in uncovering Jewish origins.

Markers Erected

NEW YORK — Markers for the unmarked graves of 266 indigent Jews were erected at a New York cemetery. The grave markers, donated by the Hebrew Free Burial Association, arrived Sept. 30 at the Mount Richmond Cemetery on Staten Island. The graves hold Jews who couldn't afford a proper burial and were interred by the burial association, which buries some 300 indigent Jews annually.

Torture key to Islamic rule in Iran, author says

By MICHAEL ISENBERG
CJN Intern

There is hope for a democratic Iran, Iranian-Canadian author Marina Nemat told a small audience at Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies recently.

UN fiasco awakens world to Iranian danger

According to Reports
Please see Page 17

Nemat wrote the popular 2007 memoir Prisoner of Tehran, which recounts her experiences growing up in Iran and being tortured in the infamous Evin Prison at 16.

About 20 people attended the early morning briefing at the Wiesenthal centre on Sept. 25. Nemat's topic was "Iran in the 21st Century: Examining Human and Civil Rights."

"Growing up before the revolution we watched the same television shows, read the same books and wore the same clothes as North Americans. We had similar cultures and values, and there's no reason we cannot have them again," she said.

"One [interview] there was me [a Christian], a Jewish man and a Muslim on a program together. We went out for drinks after and had a great time. Unity is the goal and this proves it's possible. Now we have to get that message into Iran."

Nemat said that although most Iranians are not in favour of their government, it is difficult to speak out against it.

"You don't realize the magnitude of the situation until you wake up with two guns at your head, guards ready to take you to prison. At 16, I thought I was invincible, but I soon learned the harsh reality for free speech."

She said that torture is the key to Islamic rule in Iran.

"Torture's used to intimidate and instil fear into the people. It aims to crush your soul.

"There's a limit to how much torture one can take. If I actually had the information [the guards in Evin] wanted, I probably would have given in to them eventually.

"[Those in power] are experts in torture techniques. It's been like this since the '80s. They try to convince you you're not human, but you must remember you are."

She said that her memories kept her "alive" when she lived in Iran.

"Only by living in the past did it create a beacon of hope for the future. It kept us human beings."

Nemat said that for change to take effect, everyone must become advocates for freedom.

"All Iranians in the Diaspora need to band together. If you have friends or family in Iran, try to gather as much information about what's going on, to be able to speak out.

Marina Nemat

"If you're Jewish, or of any other faith, the unity of your people takes precedence. Educate yourselves on your history, culture, current events and the problems surrounding your society. Only when your own people are unified, can peace for all people begin."

As for those living in Iran who want democracy, Nemat told them to continue to fight.

"With technology today, we see the protests and actions on YouTube. We see innocent people standing up for their rights, and we see them being persecuted thereafter.

We in Diaspora know the truth. We must continue to see it so we know what to fight for."

Nemat said the biggest challenge for change is communication between former victims of torture and the rest of the world.

Confidence lost , so too peace

From the editor's desk...

Very often, too often, Israel's friends have suggested, or urged, or demanded that the Jewish state undertake confidence-building measures toward the Palestinians to prove its earnest desire to make peace.

Very often, but not always, depending of course upon the circumstances, Israel would comply.

Soon after he cobbled together a coalition, Benjamin Netanyahu's government adopted a series of measures for that very purpose. Road blocks were removed in the West Bank, entry points were opened to Gaza and joint business ventures have been fostered. Netanyahu believes that economic prosperity for the Palestinians increases the opportunity and likelihood for political accommodation with the Palestinians. Thus, it is not surprising that he would have approved of "confidence-building" measures toward the Palestinian people, since to do so is consistent with his overall purpose of facilitating economic expansion for Israel's neighbours. Indeed, quoting the International Monetary Fund, Israel's ambassador to the United States, Michael Oren, pointed out in The CJN of Aug. 27, that "the West Bank economy is flourishing."

Most of us have observed over these many years, however, that confidence-building measures are essentially unidirectional, that is, from Israel toward the Palestinians, as if only the Palestinians need to feel confident that the people of Israel really want to make peace, yet Israelis need not feel similar confidence in their Palestinian counterparts.

Palestinian leaders – and most of Arab world leaders, too, as U.S. President Barack Obama recently discovered – are decidedly uninterested in showing Israelis that they really and truly do wish to live side by side along a Jewish state.

Two recent developments, alas, make this so sadly evident.

Last month, Obama strongly urged Palestinian Authority leader Mahmoud Abbas and Netanyahu to resume peace discussions without preconditions as quickly as possible. In light of Netanyahu's offer for a temporary freeze in settlement construction, Obama pulled back somewhat from his earlier admonition to Israel to halt all settlement activity. The Netanyahu offer was an opening that Obama saw as sufficiently face-saving for the Palestinian leadership for them to seize and reciprocate.

Not surprisingly, Abbas and his colleagues did not see it the same way. Last week, Fatah, the largest party in the Palestine Liberation Organization, and the one to which Abbas belongs, prohibited Abbas from returning to the negotiations table unless Israel freezes its settlement construction.

Fatah's Central Committee met with Abbas after the latter's meeting with Obama and Netanyahu in New York last month. Mohammed Dahlan, a member of the committee proclaimed: "Settlements and negotiations are two parallel lines that will never meet."

However, even a cursory examination of the history of prior negotiations between the two sides suggests that the adamant position by the Palestinian leadership tying negotiations to a settlement freeze is sheer domestically oriented public relations bunk.

As Abu Khaled Toameh, an Arab-Israeli journalist with the Jerusalem Post has frequently pointed out, never once in the past did settlement construction in the West Bank prevent peace negotiations between Mahmoud Abbas and, for example, former prime ministers Ariel Sharon and Ehud Olmert, or with former foreign minister Tzipi Livni.

The PA's refusal to negotiate with Israel has very little to do with standing up for the Palestinian people. Rather it has much more to do with standing up to the Hamas leadership. Of course, a further result of this ill-advised but much publicly displayed show of PA "resolve" is to thumb its nose at the need for Israelis as well to feel confident in the peace process.

The other recent coup of confidence building by the PA toward the Israeli people was its urging last week upon the UN Human Rights Council to adopt the Goldstone Commission report in full and pass it on to the General Assembly for action.

Israel and the United States were both reported to have been "furious" with the PA posture. Last Thursday night, the council postponed further debate on the report until March. Ha'aretz reported that "some sources claimed that U.S. President Barack Obama had personally intervened behind the scenes, impressing upon the Palestinians that the diplomatic process would be adversely affected if the vote were not shelved."

So upset was Netanyahu with the report that he had earlier said its adoption would "be a crippling blow to the peace process." Most Israelis agree with him.

The PA's decision to effusively endorse the Goldstone report and thereby directly endeavour to bring Israel before the International Court of Justice was not surprising. The PA correctly sees the report as advancing Palestinian aims, namely, demonizing and delegitimizing the Jewish state.

The fact, though, that these are Palestinians aims is not lost on Israelis. What is lost, however, is the planting of even the beginning of a small seed of confidence in the belief that perhaps the Palestinians, too, do truly want to coexist alongside a Jewish state.

In the end, alas, something even far greater than Israeli confidence in the peace process is lost by such predictably malevolent manoeuvring by the PA.

The Palestinian people themselves lose the possibility of a more immediately proximate peace with Israel and, finally, their own state. – MBD

Former shaliach subject of police probe

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

York Regional Police and Jewish Family & Child – the children's aid society for Toronto's Jewish community – are investigating sexual abuse allegations against Avichai Zehavi, a former shaliach at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

Zehavi was arrested in Israel last month for alleged sexual abuse of a 14-year-old male student at a religious boys' high school there. He denied allegations of sodomy after his arrest.

The 41-year-old father of four taught Tanach and rabbinics at TanenbaumCHAT's Richmond Hill campus from 2000 to 2005, then spent 10 months as a cantor at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation, where he also led youth programming and ran the synagogue's bar mitzvah program.

He also volunteered in programs run by the National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) – the youth organization affiliated with the Orthodox Union – during the first three or four years that he was at TanenbaumCHAT. Zehavi participated in programs such as Shabbat dinners, sometimes leading the singing, when he lived near NCSY's Thornhill offices. Rabbi Glenn Black, NCSY Canada's CEO, told The CJN.

Det. Chris Coleman, of York Regional Police's crimes against children unit, who is in charge of the investigation, told The CJN last Thursday that no victims had come forward to him at that point, but that there had been second-hand allegations.

He anticipated an extensive investigation that would last a couple of months, he said.

Paul Shaviv, TanenbaumCHAT's director of education, told The CJN last week that the school had completed its initial investigation and that "the matter is now in the hands of Jewish Family & Child and the local police."

In a CJN ad last week in the form of an "open letter to the community," JF&CS wrote that further allegations had come forward in Israel and in Toronto "with reference to a number of Jewish institutions. We understand… that numerous people may be affected by these allegations."

The ad noted that the agency has dedicated resources to assist, in confidence, those who were affected directly, as well as parents, teachers, faculty members or friends.

"Any and all allegations of this kind are really taken seriously," said Richard Cummings, executive director of JF&CS.

Anyone who thinks that a line may have been crossed "should certainly be in touch," said Cummings.

Adults have a responsibility under Ontario's Child and Family Service Act to report suspicions of child abuse to a children's aid society, he noted.

Anyone with information about the case should call Coleman at 1-866-876-5423, ext 6045, or JF&CS at 416-638-7800.

Threatening letter to Associated being investigated

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Toronto police are investigating a threatening communication received by Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns branch on Sept. 23.

The school, which is located on Neptune Drive, runs from nursery to Grade 5.

"They received a letter, and they forwarded it to me to see if we can see where it came from," Detective David James of 32 Division, told The CJN. "I can't give you any more details about that."

As of last Thursday, James was waiting for calls to be returned regarding the case.

The previous week, on Sept. 25, the president of the school, David Brown, sent an e-mail to parents about the situation.

"Members of a family with two children who are students at Posluns have been involved in an ongoing criminal investigation. On Wednesday, the school received a threatening communication related to this situation," he wrote.

He listed measures being taken by the school, including hiring additional uniformed security personnel and instructing the family involved that their children were not to attend school.

The school has been consulting with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's community security director, he said.

Brown also encouraged parents to be aware of their surroundings while on school property and to notify the school of anything unusual.

Cantor joins shul

In addition to the clergy mentioned in the article "Toronto shuls welcome new clergy" (Sept. 10), Cantor Katie Oringel, 27, joined Temple Sinai Congregation on July 1 as cantor and youth director. The cantor joins the synagogue's three rabbis and Cantor Gershon Silins, who has been at the temple since 2002. A native of Detroit, Cantor Oringel grew up in Houston and Fort Lauderdale. She graduated in May from New York's Hebrew Union College after completing a double degree in music and religion at Florida State University. –FK

The heroism of the Hamas torturer

Transfixed to their television sets last Friday, most everyone in Israel watched a two-minute video of Gilad Schalit, the 22-year-old soldier abducted three years ago from an army base in Israel by Hamas. The video was a sign from his kidnappers – the first visual one since his abduction – that the young man was still alive, at least as of Sept. 14, when the video was made.

Israel secured this sombre "proof of life" in exchange for the release of 20 Palestinian women who had been convicted of participating in or plotting terrorist acts against the Jewish state. Indeed, 13 of the 20 had been convicted of attempted murder.

Neither the International Red Cross nor any other international party has been granted access to Schalit during the three years of his captivity. Two letters from him have reached his family during that time, and an audio tape was released on the first anniversary of the kidnapping. But prior to the release of the video, there had been no visible evidence of his physical condition or that he was even alive.

In the video, Schalit read from a prepared text. He was pale, gaunt, clearly uncomfortable, emotionally wooden, soft-spoken to the point of being timid, but thankfully, still alive.

Ismail Haniyeh, Hamas leader in Gaza, called the prisoners-for-tape exchange "a triumph of the armed resistance against Israel, an amazing accomplishment to the Palestinians who captured Schalit."

Khaled Meshal, Hamas leader in Damascus vowed his organization would abduct more Israeli soldiers. "We will continue our efforts to kidnap soldiers in order to free every one of our prisoners in Israel."

That Haniyeh referred to the exchange as "an amazing accomplishment" is not surprising. The statement is itself poignant testament of the chasm-like difference between Hamas' and Israel's belief systems. Exchanging a score of convicted criminals for merely a scrap of evidence showing that Schalit still lives is an act that only a democratic, life-respecting society would undertake. It is the paradigm of the command to honour and protect life that governs Israeli leaders, and at the same time, the paradigm of the cruel, abject indifference to life that animates Hamas.

That Meshal vowed more kidnapping attempts is also not surprising. He understands very well that the fate of its soldiers is a national obsession over which the Jewish state long agonizes, and that through vastly asymmetric prisoner exchanges, Israel will risk exposing its people to further acts of terror in order to bring its soldiers home.

The relief in seeing that Schalit is still alive was accompanied by an aching of bittersweet shivers. His family and an entire people were submitted, once again, to the emotional and psychological torture that the Hamas leaders have perfected, and which, in their celebrated cruel, inhumane "heroism," they will only understand, yet always champion, as "an amazing accomplishment."

25 years ago in The CJN

In a speech to the United Nations General Assembly, Israeli foreign minister and deputy premier Yitzhak Shamir reiterated Israel's readiness to withdraw all of its forces from Lebanon, but he said a withdrawal would only take place if security measures are established to protect Israel's northern borders from terrorist attacks.

Goldstone report

In that the report on the hostilities in Gaza was commissioned by the United Nations Human Rights Council, it comes as no surprise of its inherent bias against Israel ("Goldstone denies bias in report critical of Israel," Sept 24). What is difficult to understand is that the report would be authored by South African Judge Richard Goldstone, who acknowledges himself to be a Zionist and has connections with Israel. As a judge, supposedly learned in the law and trained as a fact-finder, he seems to dismiss out of hand Israel's right to defend itself from attack and to provide security for its citizens. He obviously ignored such internationally recognized facts that Hamas fired rockets into Israel from schools and mosques and during the Gaza incursion fired weapons from apartment buildings filled with civilians. Goldstone seemed to find a moral equivalence between the democratic State of Israel and the terrorist entity Hamas.

Cotler is an independent thinker

I take issue with Sam Goldstein's letter, in which he states that Cotler "is nothing but a backbench MP" and then denounces the Liberal Party of Canada, as if to suggest that Cotler and the Liberal party espouse the same views on Israel ("Cotler vs. Kenney," Sept. 24).

In fact, Cotler's record on Israel and human rights in general is well-known to anyone who has read a newspaper in Canada in the past 40-plus years. In the early 1990s, when he was appointed an Officer of the Order of Canada, Cotler was described as someone "who has greatly influenced international peace and human rights" and a "human rights advocate and a pioneer in the development of peace law... engaged in the search for justice and peace for all." While it is true that Cotler is a backbench MP, he is also a distinguished legal scholar who, working with others such as Harvard law professor and author Alan Dershowitz; human rights activist Elie Wiesel; anti-apartheid activist and former president of South Africa, Nelson Mandela, and refusenik and former Israeli cabinet minister, Natan Sharansky, has done more to advance the causes of Israel and human rights the world over than most people alive today.

While it is true that the Conservative party's recent record with respect to Israel is much better than that of the Liberal party's, Cotler stands out as an independent thinker, and one who has done so much for Israel and for human rights, regardless of his political affiliations.

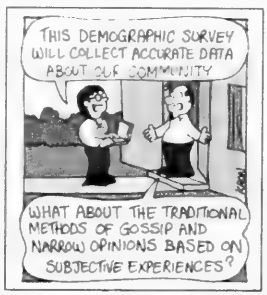
Cotler article worthy of front page

Sam Goldstein's letter ("Cotler vs. Kenney," Sept. 24) questioned the prominence of The CJN's report on former justice minister and current MP Irwin Cotler's historic human rights visit to South Africa – a country he has a long and profound association with as counsel to Nelson Mandela and as a leader of the anti-apartheid movement ("Cotler briefs South African leaders on Iran," Sept. 10.)

I was privileged to accompany Cotler on this visit and to participate in his multiple meetings in his short time in South Africa – with the South African president, Jacob Zuma; with six cabinet ministers, as well as parliamentarians and NGOs; with activist Winnie Mandela; with Zimbabwe human rights and democracy activists, and with leaders of the women's movement. I also accompanied Cotler during his testimony on freedom of expression and hate speech before the South African Human Rights Commission, during his large public lecture at Wits University, and during his keynote address to more than 1,000 members of the South African Jewish community and South African civil society, as well as Zuma.



The CJN report of these meetings on issues of grave concern to the Jewish community and to international peace and security – notably on Iran – was worthy of The CJN's front page.

UN boycott of Ahmadinejad

Dear Prime Minister Stephen Harper,

I salute you, for Canada doing the right thing, by boycotting Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's speech to the United Nations General Assembly. You are truly a light unto the nations ("Canada takes lead in UN boycott of Ahmadinejad," Oct. 1.).

May other nations take your example and do the right thing!

Israel's right of self-defence not mentioned in Goldstone report

Following are excerpts from a statement made by Israel's ambassador to the United Nations, Aharon Leshno Yaar, to the UN Human Rights Council on Sept. 29, during the debate on the fate of the Goldstone report.

For the states in this council, this is indeed a fateful time. Today's debate is a real test of the integrity and purpose of this body. But more than that, the response to the challenge presented today will have a clear effect on our ability – collectively and individually – to face some of the greatest challenges in the year ahead.

Ambassador Aharon Leshno-Yaar

Five years ago, in a remarkable gesture reaching out for peace, Israel removed every one of its soldiers and over 8,000 civilians from the Gaza Strip. We withdrew hospitals and kindergartens, synagogues and cemeteries, leaving only the greenhouses we had struggled to build in the hope that these would be the start of a productive Palestinian society.

Five years later, the greenhouses had been ransacked by Hamas thugs, over 8,000 rockets and mortars had been fired on schools and kindergartens in Sderot and other Israeli towns, and an unceasing supply of weaponry was being smuggled through tunnels into Gaza from terror-sponsoring states like Iran.

Israel's urgent appeals to the international community were to no avail, and our attempts to extend a fragile cease-fire were met with new, increased barrages of missiles from Hamas. And all the while the range of the attacks was increasing. Now Ashkelon and Be'er Sheva were within reach. One million Israeli children, women and men had to live every moment of their lives within seconds of a bomb shelter.

The decision to launch a military operation is never an easy one. It is even more challenging when we have to face an enemy that intentionally deploys its forces in densely populated areas, stores its explosives in private homes and launches rockets from crowded school yards and mosques. These are new and horrendous challenges, and we sought to deal with them responsibly and with humanity. Yet when we dropped millions of leaflets and made tens of thousands of phone calls to warn civilians in advance of operations, we were witness to the callous and deliberate Hamas tactic of sending women and children onto the roofs of terrorist headquarters and weapons factories. In such cases, again and again [military] missions were aborted, letting the Hamas terrorists escape, Israel protected Palestinian civilians that Hamas had put at risk.

In grappling with these dilemmas, we seek the guidance of other states… in discussions between officials charged with securing the lives of their own civilians, we hear genuine admiration for our restraint. For example, when Col. Richard Kemp, commander of British forces in Afghanistan, was asked about Israel's conduct in Gaza, he replied: "I don't think there has ever been a time in the history of warfare when any army has made more efforts to reduce civilian casualties and deaths of innocent people than the IDF [Israel Defence Forces] in Gaza."

In complex urban warfare, though, civilian casualties are tragically inevitable. There also may have been incidents in which soldiers did not always maintain the standards that we expected of them. The true test of a genuine democracy is how it deals with such cases, and how it examines its own failings. Following the Gaza Operation, Israel has opened over 100 separate investigations into fundamental operational questions, like damage to UN centres and medical facilities, as well as specific allegations of misconduct. Of these investigations, 23 have already resulted in criminal proceedings. And this process continues…

Israel struggles to deal with these tough questions arising of terrorists acting within civilian centres. Sadly, these are questions which also occupy many other democratic countries…

But these questions, apparently, do not occupy the authors of the shameful report which has been presented to this council.

Like many of the distinguished individuals who rejected invitations to head the fact-finding mission with its one-sided mandate, we objected to a mission which, in the words of Mary Robinson, [the former head of the UN Human Rights Commission] was "guided by politics not human rights."

While Israel has co-operated with dozens of inquiries and investigations from international organizations and NGOs into the events in Gaza, it refused to co-operate with this mission. And the report presented today fully justifies that decision…

This is a report – 575 pages – in which the right of self-defence is not mentioned, in which the smuggling of weapons into Gaza through hundreds of tunnels deserves not a word.

A report based on pre-screened Palestinian witnesses, not one of whom was asked about Hamas terrorist activity or the abuse of civilians, hospitals and mosques for terrorist attacks.

A report which is based on carefully selected incidents, cherry-picked for political effect. As Justice Goldstone revealed in an open correspondence: "We did not deal with the problems of conducting military operations in civilian areas. We avoided having to do so in the incidents we decided to investigate."

A report which gives credibility to every allegation or hearsay against Israel, and none to even direct admissions of guilt by Hamas leaders. Indeed, which sometimes accepts the same source as authoritative as against Israel, but somehow unreliable vis-a-vis Hamas…

The report was instigated as part of a political campaign, and it represents a political assault directed against Israel and against every state forced to confront terrorist threats.

Unlike the Hamas terrorists who rejoice with every civilian death, Israel regards every civilian casualty as a tragedy. Israel is committed to fully examining every allegation of wrongdoing. Not because of this report but despite it.

For let there be no doubt. This report… is a betrayal of Israelis and moderate Palestinians alike.

In the final analysis, the true test of such a report can only be whether in future armed conflicts it will have the effect of increasing or decreasing respect for the rule of law by the parties. Regrettably this one-sided report, claiming to represent international law but in fact perverting it to serve a political agenda, can only weaken the standing of international law in future conflicts.

This report broadcasts a troubling – and legally unfounded – message to states everywhere confronting terrorist threats, that international law has no effective response to offer them, and so serves to undermine willingness to comply with its provisions.

At the same time, it signals an even more troubling message to terrorist groups, wherever they are, that the cynical tactics of seeking to exploit civilian suffering for political ends actually pays dividends.

Finally, and perhaps most importantly, we want to find a way to live in peace with our neighbours. This is the ultimate question that Prime Minister Netanyahu asked the General Assembly in New York last week: "The same UN that cheered Israel as it left Gaza and promised to back our right of self-defense now accuses us… of war crimes? And for what? For acting responsibly in self-defence?… Israel justly defended itself against terror. This biased and unjust report is a clear-cut test for all governments. Will you stand with Israel or will you stand with the terrorists? Because if Israel is again asked to take more risks for peace, we must know today that you will stand with us tomorrow. Only if we have the confidence that we can defend ourselves can we take further risks for peace."

The third threat

By GABRIEL SIBONI

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

Ever since its establishment, Israel has had to deal with the threat from the Arab states.

At first the Arab countries put together a military force with the aim of conquering Israel. In the face of this physical threat, Israel developed a doctrine of building a force that allowed it to thwart the invasion attempts. When the enemy realized that their approach was not effective, the doctrine of "resistance" was constructed, combining activity by states and organizations.

This doctrine is backed by the developing of hostile groups who send steep-trajectory weapons from civilian areas into population centres in Israel. Since this threat was identified, defence officials have been working to answer it. The experiences in the Second Lebanon War and Operation Cast Lead formed part of the process of formulating that answer.

In recent years, however, an additional threat has been developing. Its main thrust: attempts by pro-Arab organizations to destroy Israel's legitimacy as a political entity. There are many examples of this, such as accusations of an apartheid policy, Holocaust denial and the claim that the state's establishment was an illegal act, as well as accusations that Israel has committed war crimes. These lead to boycotts of Israeli companies and products, academic and cultural boycotts and ultimately calls to destroy the Zionist entity.

This threat is different from the previous distinctly military ones – its characteristics are not physical and the areas of action are the countries of the world and their citizens. But it combines with the physical threat in an attempt to delegitimize the Israeli response to the Hamas threat.

The Goldstone report, which is part of it, is creating a legal infrastructure that supports the filing of law suits abroad against top officials in the army and defence establishment. In fact, it is possible to see the two elements of the threat – the physical and political – as two parts of an integral action against Israel.

The Defence Ministry has led the development of a response to the changing military threat against Israel. However, the threat of delegitimization is not receiving the attention it deserves, for it is not clear in government circles who bears the overall responsibility for dealing with this and putting together a complete response doctrine.

If we accept the argument that the two threats, the physical and political, are two parts of a single threat, no one appears to be looking at the entire picture with an overall strategic vision.

The government's decision makers have to understand that the attacks on Israel's political legitimacy are not a mere drip but are now a veritable flood. The danger that this attack will in the future influence decision makers in the international community must not be ignored. To take preventive action, we must set up a framework to examine the threat and develop a comprehensive response. The most suitable institution in Israel for doing so is the National Security Council, which can get help from the defence establishment, the Foreign Ministry, the authorities responsible for public relations, world Jewry and pro-Israel organizations.

During its existence, Israel has been able to create a suitable response to the changing military threat. However, a response to the attempts to delegitimize Israel also depends on the development of a strategic outlook with respect to another important factor: the faith of the country's citizens in our national existence in this land, regardless of our many political disagreements.

Various pro-Arab bodies in the world are trying, with some success, to confuse some of the people of this country and damage their basic belief in the Jews' right to a national home in Israel. Deepening the belief in the justice of our national existence here is one of the main tools for thwarting this plot.

Gabriel Siboni is head of the military research program at the Institute for National Security Studies.

Opinions

A sinister agenda

Christians who suspect that some Jews use interfaith dialogue as a way of seeking support in efforts on behalf of Israel may have a point. Similarly, Jews who suspect that some Christians use the dialogue as a subterfuge for missionary activity may also be right.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

The Catholic commitment to convert Jews was confirmed recently in a statement by the U.S. Conference of Catholic Bishops when they "clarified" that a previous document mistakenly played down the importance of converting non-Christians, including Jews.

Contrary to statements by the late Pope John II that God never revoked the "old covenant" with Israel, a spokesperson for the Conference alleged that its current stance reflects the authentic Vatican position: "While the Catholic Church does not proselytize the Jewish people, neither does she fail to witness to them her faith in Christ, nor to welcome them to share in that same faith whenever appropriate."

Though Jews don't seek converts, they do need Christian allies, both in defence of Israel and to fight anti-Semitism. The love affair between American evangelicals and right-wing Israeli politicians is a case in point. Isi Leibler, an Orthodox right-wing columnist in the Jerusalem Post, wrote recently that "on Israel-related issues, a pragmatic co-operation is not a matter of creed but of political common sense." It suggests that many Jews respond to Christian overtures out of political, not religious, reasons.

Leibler laments that "some liberal Jews continue to criticize the relationship." I'm one of them – and proud of it. For I fear that evangelicals may exploit Jewish needs for political influence for their own missionary work. They may love Jews, but they hate Judaism and believe that Judaism has been superseded by Christianity and thus rendered irrelevant. They may not be as blatant as the Catholic bishops, but they aren't less ardent.

That's why interfaith dialogue only works between sincere individuals and small groups committed to collaboration on joint projects across religions and denominations. It's doomed to fail when institutions with hidden agendas of their own are involved. Even though some organizations that bring together Christians, Jews and now also Muslims undoubtedly do very good work in the service of peace and reconciliation, their institutional affiliations and loyalties can easily lead to disappointments and worse, however much the Leiblers of this world would like to think otherwise.

"The blows a friend gives are well meant, but the kisses of an enemy are perfidious" (Proverbs 27:6). We've good reason to heed our talmudic sages (Taanit 20a) when they cite this verse to warn against the danger of flatterers with a sinister agenda.

Tishrei teaches there's more than 'I and I'

While driving the other day, I saw a license plate that must rank as the ultimate vanity plate. It read "I and I," and I'm assuming it doesn't indicate that the owners are Ina and Ira.

Rather, I think it a take-off on Martin Buber's Ich und Du, published in 1923, and translated as I and Thou.

Seymour Epstein in Toronto

The very same day, I was making our Pesach wine in the garage and thinking deep thoughts about this Tishrei holiday season, as compared with Nisan and Pesach. It's a wonderful quirk of the northern hemisphere's growing season that we use the autumn grapes we hoped for in the spring to make the wine we will use next spring at the Pesach seder. And we do this in the midst of the overflow of holy days that constitute the month of Tishrei – Rosh Hashanah, Tzom Gedaliah, the Ten Days of Repentance, Yom Kippur, Sukkot, Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah make Tishrei a full month of feasting, prayer, fasting and family time.

But, what does this have to do with I and Thou? Buber's notion of mutuality is a 20th-century rendition of values revealed and taught centuries ago in our biblical and talmudic texts. Simply stated, it's the idea that when I look in the eyes of the other, I should see the "I" that resides in me. The same hopes, aspirations, fears, misgivings, and desires that are mine dwell equally in the body and soul of the person in front of me.

This allows for honour and respect that goes way beyond tolerance and politeness. In fact, it demands it. "I and I" is the precise opposite of that position. It's the attitude of the "me generation." It's solipsism to the exclusion of any external force, human or divine, that could temper the demands and desires of the powerful ego.

A month such as Tishrei teaches us in so many ways that "I" is not enough. First, the very cycle of harvest, winter sleep, rebirth, growth and yet another harvest is not ours to determine. We must work with it to produce our food, but sun and rain in their seasons are part of God's cycle of nature. The mixed imagery of the sukkah in its fragility and the four species in their beauty permit us to celebrate the harvest in its bounty, and yet know the dangers of a poor harvest in a bad year.

The fact that all the fasting and praying of the Ten Days of Repentance don't pardon us from sins committed against other human beings, but only from our wrongdoing against God is an overwhelming message about the need for human mutuality. We can't experience the unique (a better translation for kadosh than "holy") days of Tishrei in synagogue and with family and friends without seeing what's beyond our own ego – in both the human and the divine.

The prayers of Tishrei that praise, thank, request, and honour do indeed give the individual a strong sense of self. To pray sincerely is to believe in one's power to influence the Creator and His/Her cosmos. But our prayers are mostly in the plural form in order for us to see and feel those around us as equals. Even the confessional is all plural, so that we can share our anxiety with others and take on their guilt with our own. And, of course, all sincere prayer recognizes the transcendent, which is beyond our merely human potential. Prayer opens us to that which is beyond us. Way beyond "I and I."

This month of holidays that we soon close with Simchat Torah – a celebration of the cycle of teaching God's values – confronts us each year with our own strength and power, the cycle of nature, the transcendent beyond us, and the eyes of the other, which reveal the "I" in every human being on this planet.

I sincerely hope the car belonged to Ina and Ira, and not some misguided, egocentric, sad soul.

Zaide in the archives

The other day, I met my zaide in the archives.

As part of my sabbatical project, I'm doing research at the U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum in Washington D.C. The museum has a vast – one might say overwhelming – range of archival material, and a cadre of talented and dedicated historians, archivists and librarians help researchers navigate a rich collection of documents, testimonies, diaries and other material attesting to the Nazi genocide, and the diversity of Jewish life before the destruction.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

I was tracing a thread that involved a number of eastern European shtetls between the two world wars, looking through yizkor (memorial) books and old photographs. On a whim, I decided to see what I could find from the shtetl where my mother's family hailed from. I had once seen a photo of the Jewish landmark of the town – a lovely wooden synagogue, one that was burned down during World War II. I wondered whether I might find some photos of the town itself – buildings where people lived almost a century ago, or the market square – or perhaps I could find a familiar name on lists of people drawn up at various times for different purposes. I looked at names of Jewish draftees over several decades, as well as names of Jewish businesses and families, but came up wanting.

And then, there he was. In a sepia-coloured photo in front of the shtetl's wooden shul, I saw my my zaide's face – younger, of course, than I had ever known him, but his face, unmistakably. He was standing with a few other men, all looking straight ahead into the camera with the seriousness of expression one wore when photography was still a formal occasion. Zaide was by far the youngest, wearing a jaunty cap, and he was the only one wearing a tie. The photo was captioned, "Orthodox men in front of synagogue." I looked further and saw that someone had identified some of the men, and there was my zaide's name.

By the date assigned to the photo, and by my zaide's age, I knew that the photo had been taken not long before he left the shtetl for good. It was after World War I, but before the rise of Nazism. The crushing poverty and ongoing anti-Semitism convinced Zaide to wager on the unknown, to wend his way through Europe and bring his young family to America. I remember hearing stories of his fascination with the modern innovations that he found en route – such as flush toilets in more westernized countries.

It was only as a child that I knew my Zaide, alav hashalom. I was barely five when he passed away. People speak of his intelligence and tolerance, but I remember his gentleness. The photo captured him in his youthful optimism.

Susan Sontag once wrote, "All photographs are memento mori," reminders of our mortality. "Precisely by slicing out this moment and freezing it, all photographs testify to time's relentless melt." And to some extent, sitting with this photo had the feeling of a pilgrimage to the grave of ancestors – kever avot. It told of a chronotype – a place and a time – that is closed to me.

But if Sontag was correct about the way photographs call up our mortality, it's also true that they can call us to life, and call the past to life inside us. What I searched for in the photograph, what had sent me on an impulse into the archives of zaide's shtetl, was the desire for some handle on a past that had so rapidly receded – the daily lives of my ancestors, the world of the shtetl encountering modernity, the place of unrecounted memories that nonetheless lodge in the hearts of those who come after.

I sent around a scan of the photo to my siblings and some of my cousins. Each of us read ourselves into this image of his youth: traditional, rebellious, adventurous, intuitive, daring. We agreed about one thing: in ways that he could not have imagined when he persuaded his bride to cross the ocean with him, we owed our lives to this choice.

Jewish studies take off at universities in Poland

Jewish studies in Poland – a country whose Jewish population exceeded three million before the Holocaust – have taken off at Polish universities in the past 20 years.

At Maria Curie-Sklodowska University in Lublin, Jagiellonian University in Krakow and Warsaw University in the nation's capital, among other institutions of higher learning, a new generation of Polish Catholic scholars versed in Yiddish and Hebrew are exploring a wide range of topics, and writing monographs and books about them.

Sheldon Kirshner in Poland

"There is not much awareness abroad of this scholarship, since so few people read Polish," said Konstanty Gebert, a Warsaw-based journalist and the director of the Taube Foundation for Jewish Life and Culture, which provides grants to Polish scholars interested in Jewish subjects.

Monika Adamczyk-Garbowska, head of the Center for Jewish Studies at Maria Curie-Sklodowska University, is one such scholar. Garbowska, 53, whose interests range from Yiddish literature to yizkor books, was one of the founders of the centre in 2000.

Part of the department of cultural studies, it offers a two-year program, with a diploma, in Jewish studies. It has five professors, including historians and a philologist, and an enrolment of 33 students. Unlike Jagiellonian University, it does not grant a BA or MA degree in Jewish studies.

Garbowska, a scholar-in-residence at the United States Holocaust Memorial Museum in 2006 and 2007, was originally in American studies. She switched to Jewish studies after receiving a letter from a person in Britain in 1977 soliciting her opinion of Isaac Bashevis Singer, the Polish-born novelist who immigrated to the United States prior to World War II and won the Nobel Prize for literature in 1978.

Monika Adamczyk-Garbowska

Astonishingly enough, she had never even heard of Singer, some of whose stories are set in Lublin, a town in eastern Poland whose Jewish community was virtually wiped out by the Nazis.

"In 1977, Jewish topics were still practically taboo in Poland," she said in a reference to the previous Communist government's somewhat skittish attitude to things Jewish. "Almost nothing by Singer had been published in Polish. He was an inconvenient writer because he was anti-communist and had compared Stalin to Hitler."

Her curiosity whetted, she read Satan in Goray and The Manor. She was so impressed that she decided to translate his books into Polish. At first, she translated Singer from English, but after learning Yiddish at Columbia University in the late 1980s, she translated his works from the original Yiddish. "His stories are richer in Yiddish," observed Garbowska, whose husband is a Canadian of Polish descent.

In addition to her translations, she has written Isaac Bashevis Singer's Poland: Exile and Return (1994). "Singer helped unblock Jewish topics in Poland," she explained in an interview in her office. "His books were best-sellers. Today, Singer is better known in Poland than in the United States."

A member of the editorial board of the academic journal Polin: Studies in Polish Jewry, Garbowska is also the author of Shades of Identity: Jewish Literature as a Multilingual Phenomenon (2004), Contemporary Jewish Writing in Poland. An Anthology (2001) and Kazimierz vel Kuzmir: A Shtetl of Various Dreams (2006).

Her research on yizkor, or memorial books, fill a need. "They are a rich but a rather neglected body of works," she wrote in a monograph, Patterns of Return: Survivors' Postwar Journeys to Poland. "The treatment of survivors returning to their hometowns after the Holocaust was mainly one of indifference, with hostility and sympathy in between," she observed.

Edyta Gawron, a 36-year-old historian at Jagiellonian University's department of Jewish studies, teaches courses on the history of Polish Jews in the 20th century, contemporary Israel and the Holocaust.

The department was created nine years ago, replacing a chair in Polish Jewish history that had been established in 1986, during the last years of communism. Currently, the department has 160 students in BA and MA programs and 15 PhD candidates. "Jagiellonian University was a pioneer in Jewish studies," said Gawron, who formerly headed the Galicia Jewish Museum's education and research department.

Edyta Gawron

Born in Wloszczowa, near Krakow, she drifted into Jewish studies through an interest in the history of her birthplace, where Jews once comprised more than half of its population. "It was a step by step process. I got sucked into Jewish studies."

Having written Jews in Wloszczowa: 1867-1942, she is now awaiting the publication of her latest book, Jews in Krakow after the Holocaust 1945-1995. "Krakow was a transit point for Jews going to the West," she said. "Seven thousand Jews lived here after the war. But Jews returning to Krakow were not always nicely welcomed."

As she notes in her book, Krakow was convulsed by a pogrom on Aug. 11, 1945, in which two Jews were killed and a synagogue was damaged. The authorities condemned the rampage, triggered by a false rumour that Jews had murdered Polish children, but the Catholic Church was silent.

Currently, Gawron is working on a paper titled The Polish Jews' Migrations after the Holocaust, 1945-1948.

Gawron's colleague at Jagiellonian University, Maciej Tomal, 45, teaches at Warsaw University as well. He has taught modern Hebrew language and grammar, Hebrew literature and the history of Zionism and Israel. He is also an expert in Aramaic.

Tomal, whose wife has a Jewish parent and lived in Israel after leaving Poland following the 1968 state-sanctioned anti-Semitic campaign, was drawn into Jewish studies by way of the Jewish philosopher Gershom Scholem. "I was fascinated by the world of Jewish mysticism as presented by Scholem," he explained. "I realized that I had to learn Hebrew to better understand him."

In the mid-1980s, he set about mastering Hebrew. His teacher, Witold Tyloch, a Warsaw University professor, died in 1990. Tomal assumed he could learn Hebrew easily. But as he delved deeper into it, he realized that it was a difficult language.

He began teaching Hebrew at Warsaw University in 1988, a year before the collapse of the Communist regime. His students, then and now, were largely Poles without any Jewish roots who were interested in Hebrew culture. "Young Polish people are generally interested in Jewish culture," he said. "Sometimes, their starting point is the belief that it's an integral component of Polish culture. Jewish culture is indeed an element of Polish identity, despite all the disturbances that have affected Polish-Jewish relations. Our common history is very strong."

Maciej Tomal

Tomal's first visit to Israel in 2000 sharpened his Hebrew speaking skills. "After two weeks, I felt comfortable in Hebrew and at home in Israel." Since then, he has been a regular visitor.

Next to Jewish studies, Poland has also experienced something of a boom in the publication of books on Jewish themes.

Marek Szukalak, the director of the Foundation Monumentum Judaicum Lodzense in the city of Lodz, has published more than 200 titles since 1989. "Among young Poles, there is an enormous interest," he said. "The older generation has problems with Jews in terms of attitudes and stereotypes."

In Krakow, Wojiech and Malgorzata Ornat, a Polish couple with Jewish ancestors, have been churning out Jewish-themed books and maps since 2001 through their Austeria publishing house. "Demand has been growing," she said. "We fill a real niche."

Theodore Bikel brings Sholom Aleichem to life

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

One of the Jewish community's most beloved thespians, Theodore Bikel, is bringing his acclaimed one-man show to the Winter Garden Theatre next week.

Written by Bikel, Sholom Aleichem Laughter Through Tears, is a look at Aleichem's life through music and stories. The show, presented by the Harold Green Jewish Theatre Company, is in Toronto Oct 13 to 18.

Russian-born Sholom Aleichem (1859-1916) was the popular Jewish humorist and author of Yiddish literature who introduced the world to Tevye the Milkman. The character inspired the landmark Broadway musical Fiddler on the Roof, with Bikel as Tevye. The Viennese-born actor gloriously brought Tevye to life more than 2,000 times over 37 years.

"Sholom Aleichem has been part of my life ever since I was a small boy," said Bikel, 85. He said Aleichem is the quintessential Yiddish writer who epitomizes everything about the Old World and the shtetl.

"For his time, he was an intensely modern man as well, who knew world literature. While he concentrated on the milieu of his people, he was well versed in everything else as well."

Bikel said he is writing about two kinds of journeys. "One is my own journey as an artist and as a Jew, which then intersects with Sholom Aleichem's journey, in which I am able to take pieces of his writing and bring them to life." Bikel will be playing dozens of Aleichem's characters, from young boys to old men and women.

"Let's face it, something that is written on the page for the purposes of performance has to be lifted and made three dimensional."

Bikel thinks that "laughter through the tears" is something that goes through Jewish life. "We always manage to find the laughter, even in the midst of sadness. We certainly know in the midst of laughing and humour, there is always that little tear. It is a Jewish trait that we do have. It is kind of unique. I don't know it in any other people."

Bikel wrote the play based on Aleichem's writings, which he grew up with. "I have all his volumes on my shelves. After dinner, my father used to read to us a short story, a monologue or even a whole play in Yiddish, so that has accompanied me through all my life."

Bikel has always championed the Yiddish language. "It has been threatened by extinction in some many ways – the Holocaust not only murdered six million people, but also a language along with it," he said. "There were survivors, and the survivors carried the language with them. Today, Yiddish is threatened in other ways, by apathy, laziness and Jews, who tried to make an either/or proposition out of Hebrew versus Yiddish."

Coincidently, this year is the 150th anniversary of Aleichem's birth, and Bikel performed this show to rave reviews in Washington, D.C., and Florida, and will be taking it to New York after the Toronto run.

Theodore Bikel as Sholom Aleichem

He said the show appeals to both Jews and non-Jews. "People have told me that they are taking away from this show a renewed appreciation of the lasting value of 'folk writing.' Sholom Aleichem wrote of a time and a place that can only live with us, if we manage to get the descriptions of the huts that they lived in, and of how exquisitely they treated their own poverty."

Bikel, a graduate of the Royal Academy of Dramatic Art, is a star of stage, film and television, an accomplished musician and renowned social activist. The actor has appeared on stage with Laurence Olivier, Vivien Leigh and Peter Ustinov, and played Captain VonTrapp in the first production of The Sound of Music on Broadway.

Bikel's film career began with the 1951 classic The African Queen, in which he played opposite Humphrey Bogart and Katherine Hepburn. He received an Oscar nomination for his portrayal of the southern sheriff in The Defiant Ones in 1958.

On the small screen, the Emmy Award-winning actor, appeared in numerous shows, including The Twilight Zone, Hawaii Five-O, All in the Family, Murder She Wrote, Star Trek: The Next Generation and Law and Order

The folk-singing troubadour, a longtime recording artist, co-founded the Newport Folk Festival.

A kiddush cup design competition and exhibition showcases styles that are meant to give new meaning to Jewish ritual events that are sanctified with wine, its curator says.

The exhibit, titled "Blessings and Innovation: Celebrating Ideas in Ritual Cup Design," has been on display at Beth Tzedec Congregation's Reuben & Helene Dennis Museum since Sept. 21. It features artists' unique interpretations on the classic, simple bronze or silver cup used for making Kiddush on Shabbat and holidays, or at simchahs.

The competition enabled artists to create a cup out of any material, preferably catering to a specific holiday or event in the Jewish life cycle, such as Passover or a wedding.

"This is the opportunity for new, personal meanings to develop for the holidays [and other events]," said museum curator Dorion Liebgott. "The cup has a story and depth related to a specific point in Judaism, so when a person uses it, the cup itself will further enhance that moment."

The winners of the competition will be announced Oct. 18 at a kosher wine-tasting event at the museum. The cups are also being sold as part of a two-week silent auction. The winning bids will be revealed that night.

Liebgott said the design competition, exhibit and auction all grew out of her friend's idea to have a wine-tasting fundraiser for the museum.

"In Jewish rituals, wine necessitates a cup, so the events go hand in hand," Liebgott said.

There will be four categories of winners: best cup composed of pottery or similar material, as well as of metal and glass, and most innovative design for a ceremonial cup.

"We have several categories of winners, so artists can express themselves as they most feel comfortable," Liebgott said.

Zahava Lambert's Miriam's Timbrel Cup is a large, sterling silver chalice with silver bells hanging down the edges, symbolizing Miriam and the women who sang and played tambourines after crossing the Red Sea.

David Ivens' Magen Dovid Cup, looks like the Vince Lombardi Super Bowl trophy with a Star of David as the frame.

Charles Funnell's Flames of Shabbat is a sterling silver cup in the shape of a flame. Its bronze cup holder is coated with flames as well. Liebgott said the artist intended to show that just as Shabbat begins with flames, followed by Kiddush, so does it end with flames and wine during Havdalah.

The judges are all distinguished art professionals, including Sara Levine Petroff, owner and curator of Petroff Gallery in Toronto.

The artists will be at the Oct. 18 event to discuss their works.

Auction prices start from $18 to $4,000. Cups will remain on display at the museum for three months after the event. Cups not sold in the silent auction will remain on sale.

To register for the wine-tasting event, call 416-781-3511.

UN fiasco awakens world to Iranian danger

According to Reports

By PAUL MICHAELS

Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's Sept. 23 address to the United Nations General Assembly was a vicious, if predictable, screed. Canada set a principled example. In anticipation of its contents, the Canadian delegation, led by Foreign Affairs Minister Lawrence Cannon, boycotted Ahmadinejad's address. Other western nations followed Canada's lead.

While Holocaust denial has long been a staple of Ahmadinejad's anti-Semitism, on this occasion, he upped the ante, expounding on a Jewish conspiracy to control the world's "politics, economy and culture... by its complicated networks and [to] establish a new form of slavery."

On the National (CBC, Sept. 24), commentator Rex Murphy commended the Canadian government for being "a rare voice of brave lucidity in rebuking the detestable assertions of Iran's president."

He added: "It was a really good speech to stay away from, with its replay of that oldest of hateful anti-Jewish bile, of the sinister web cast by the Jews over all aspects of the world."

Murphy asked rhetorically: "Can it be the 21st century in which these words are spoken in a world forum?"

At least important world leaders are speaking up, warning that such words are not mere bluster meant to stave off internal dissent, but rather reflect a sick obsession with Jews that runs deep in Iran's Islamic leadership.

Having nuclear weapons and the missiles to deliver them becomes a scenario too frightening to contemplate. Indeed, the deluge of media reports – especially after a second, secret site to develop nuclear fuel was discovered near Qom – make it clear that massive international attention is being paid to the danger that a nuclear Iran poses to the world, not just to Israel.

Israeli strategy, accordingly, has recently been to let the United States and Europe take the lead in trying to stop Iran's nuclear program.

The Globe and Mail's lead editorial "Sanctions against going nuclear" (Sept. 28) summed up this attitude: "An end to Iran's nuclear weapons ambitions must ... be a priority for the world."

A huge amount of ink has been spilled trying to figure out how such an end can be achieved. Most media argue that if the six-nation talks with Iran being held (as of this writing) in Geneva fail – and almost no one believes they will succeed – a biting round of sanctions will have to be imposed. But even if the United States, Britain, France and Germany get Russia and China to go along with vastly toughened sanctions – something many concede will be unlikely, given the large amount of business the latter two nations do with Iran – then the Iranian regime will almost certainly continue to put its nuclear agenda ahead of any suffering felt by its citizens. After all, it felt no compunction about brutally attacking Iranians who protested their country's heavily tainted election results.

And then what?

Almost all western media agree, as the Globe editorial noted, that war with Iran could be "catastrophic." It might not even eliminate the nuclear threat, just set it back by a number of years.

The question, however, is what is worse: a catastrophic war with Iran, or an intolerable, radically destabilizing situation in which nuclear weapons are in the hands of a fanatical Islamic regime?

Toronto Star columnist Haroon Siddiqui, who is habitually one-sided in his denunciations of Israel, has recently found additional cover in emphasizing the Jewishness of Israel's critics, such as Richard Goldstone ("Shining a light on Israeli aggression in Gaza" Sept. 20) and Richard Falk ("Israel keeps shooting the messenger" Sept. 27).

Siddiqui described Falk as "another high-profile Jewish public intellectual critical of Israeli policies on Palestinians." This, of course, makes Falk sound entirely reasonable. But what Siddiqui didn't tell his readers is that this "Jewish public intellectual" is not a fair-minded critic, but a notorious, fanatical Israel-basher who has accused Israel of carrying out a Nazi-like Holocaust on the Palestinians.

Space does not allow more details. Suffice it to say that by invoking Falk, and not disclosing what he stands for, Siddiqui scratches the bottom of a deep and rotting barrel.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Part of the Canadian mosaic

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

A not uncommon custom among Jews of Syrian descent is to light an additional candle on each of the eight nights of Chanukah. What is the meaning of this custom and where did their nine-branched (excluding the shamash) chanukiyah originate?

Oral traditions among families who light this extra candle explain that subsequent to their expulsion from Spain in 1942 and their eventual resettlement in Alepo and Aram Soba, they began to light this additional candle as recognition of their communities' successful migration, one they perceived as nothing short of miraculous.

In a similar vein, the migration and resettlement of Jews from Arab lands in the last century can also be viewed as miraculous.

The United Nations vote to establish a Jewish homeland was an immediate catalyst for many things: the realization of a dream of 200 years, the subsequent declaration of war by virtually all Arab states and the end of Jewish communities dating back thousands of years.

In retaliation for the modern State of Israel, Jews in Arab lands around the world suddenly found themselves decidedly unwelcome. The reactions varied from country to country – from outright expulsions and confiscations of private and communal property to limits imposed on personal freedom in travel, education and employment. The mood in Arab Street was ugly and unpredictable to say the least. Mass migration was, in one way or other, imposed on the Jews of Arab lands.

For the great majority, the nascent State of Israel was the logical destination. In making aliyah, these people were effectively ending 2,000 years of Diaspora. For the others, who chose the capitals of Europe or the Americas, Diaspora continued.

During this particular time, Canadian visas, while not easy to come by, were relatively easier to obtain than those for the United States, and if people were not able to procure visas for the United States, Canada was perceived as the next best thing.

The Canadian Sephardi community recently marked the 50-year milestone of this immigration. In this relatively short time, they have managed to establish themselves economically, participating in both commerce and the professions.

Socially, they chose to remain true to their heritage. Being culturally distinct, the community, while fully participating in endeavours such as local Jewish federations, B'nai Brith Canada and the like, established their own separate synagogues wherein their unique customs and liturgy could find expression.

Today this community flourishes mainly in Montreal and Toronto, although there is also a presence in Ottawa and Vancouver. The community now proudly comprises dozens of congregations. It has its own day schools where the children are educated, and even several kollelim - institutes of advanced study. As is the norm in every Jewish community, the Sephardi community is concerned with the good and welfare of those in need through its many chesed organizations.

With time and exposure, Sephardi customs, culture and cuisine have become less and less an exotic item, but simply another variation in the wider kaleidoscope of the greater Jewish community.

The free service: a new shul model

My Yom Kippur was beautiful. Services were filled with singing and dancing, sermons with powerful messages and breaks – well, no, there wasn't one! I never thought I could sit in services from 7:30 a.m. until 7:30 p.m. But there I was, in shul all day, praying along with an entranced congregation.

CLASS ACT
By Daniel Held

At about 4 p.m., as we were finishing Musaf and about to dive into Minchah, I took a short break and walked downstairs. There, in the social hall, the synagogue was hosting a free, all-English, no-RSVP required, one-hour Yom Kippur service that was open to the public. The room was packed.

The Hebrew Institute of Riverdale (HIR) in New York City, affectionately known as the Bayit of Riverdale, sees its role as being a shul for the entire community – dues-paying members and all local residents.

In the days leading up to Yom Kippur, members were asked to take home flyers for the service to put up in local shops or their apartment buildings. Rabbi Avi Weiss insisted that everyone would be welcome and each "regular" shul attendee had a responsibility to invite those who might not otherwise attend a service. Sure enough, everyone came: young and old, with wheelchairs and walkers, with kippot or not, dressed in their Yom Tov finest or in jeans. Nearly 500 people crowded into the social hall.

As the traditional service began an uplifting Minchah upstairs that, at times, could be heard through the ceiling, the free service began its own form of prayer. Each person was greeted and made to feel at home as they entered the room. Men and women sat together and each person was handed a machzor. The service was simple, consisting of songs and stories, meditations and prayers in English. Rabbi Weiss used personal anecdotes to connect with the crowd and drew on personal connections with particular congregants to teach specific prayers.

The shaliach tzibur taught and led Unetane Tokef using Leonard Cohen's song Who by Fire, the Shema was sung in both English and Hebrew, and the hour-long service concluded with Yizkor.

The service sets the Hebrew Institute apart from any other synagogues I have attended. All too often, especially on the High Holidays, access to prayer is limited to dues-paying members with tickets and/or those fluent in Jewish ritual. Entering a synagogue where liturgy and ritual are foreign can be an intimidating and off-putting experience – even to seasoned shul-goers – and the cost of a High Holiday ticket limits attendance at all our synagogues.

The free service seeks to lower the bar for engagement and open the synagogue to the entire community. The flyer advertising the program made this clear: a free, all-English, one-hour Yom Kippur service with no RSVP necessary. The explanations given throughout the service, as well as the language of prayer, the teaching of songs and the use of personal meditation, made the service accessible to everyone in the room.

Even as Minchah continued upstairs, the entire synagogue staff was in the free service – three rabbis, rabbinic interns, the cantor, the youth director and the director of the Hebrew school. All were welcoming the attendees and encouraging the service along. The common mission of engagement was clear. At the end, Rabbi Weiss invited everyone to the final service of the day, Neilah, upstairs in the main sanctuary, insisting that there's always room for new faces.

While the free service may not be an appropriate model for all congregations, the statement it makes about a synagogue's role is critical for the success of congregations in our contemporary world. Shuls cannot view themselves solely as membership-driven organizations, but rather must see their mission as serving the spiritual needs of the entire Jewish community, with the support of their memberships.

Jewish Life

Being Jewish far from home

A lot can change in a year. Just ask Jewish student-turned-teacher Andrew Farberman.

One short year ago, Farberman was attending the University of Ottawa, but now the 23-year-old is at a different school, far from his family's home in Richmond Hill, Ont. The school, Child U, is in South Korea, where Andrew teaches English to young Korean children.

On Campus
By Justin Dahan

While outside Canada, Farberman was able to connect with a friend from Ottawa, Atilla Szonyi, who is in the same program, teaching English at Wadong Middle School in Ansan, South Korea.

Farberman and Szonyi, along with three other Jewish teachers in South Korea: Mitch Schwartz (Toegyewon Elementary School), Mark Gluzman (Evan English School) and Shari Jennifer Danan (SLT Hagwan), have formed a small Jewish clique in the Asian country.

For these five people to get together, as they did for Rosh Hashanah, they must each travel from one to two hours using local transportation. But despite the obstacles, these young Jews believe in keeping their traditions alive, even in South Korea.

Did any of them complain about the travel or the difficulties in celebrating a Jewish holiday far from a major Jewish centre? The only complaint I heard was from Farberman, who told me, "You wouldn't believe how hard it was to find challah."

It may have been hard, but he did it.

South Korea has a very small Jewish community, and these five students have formed a secondary Jewish community of their own. Needless to say, it can be difficult to maintain Jewish traditions in a place that doesn't have many people who share similar ideas and traditions.

Schwartz explains the importance of observing tradition on the High Holidays. "I've been in Korea for almost a year now, and being so far away, it's natural that you miss home sometimes. When I think of the High Holidays, I think of home and family. So being able to share a home-cooked meal with some friends from back home that I haven't seen in a long time for me really underscored the importance of maintaining traditions.

"I think it can be easy to take Rosh Hashanah for granted when it's part of your regular daily life. I think making an extra effort to observe the holiday so far away from home made me appreciate it more."

Szonyi offered up his apartment to his Jewish brethren for this celebration. Why did he do it?

"We must retain those traditions that make us who we are," he said. "Celebrating Rosh Hashanah and fasting on Yom Kippur are traditions that have been kept by our ancestors, regardless of time and place. Being in Korea with such a small Jewish community, here is no exception. I decided to host a Rosh Hashanah dinner, following my family's tradition of wine, challah, chicken soup, chicken schnitzel and, of course, apples and honey to make all of our years abroad as sweet as possible. We all came together, and it felt like home. It was a great success."

Farberman echoed these sentiments.

"Working in a foreign country is an enriching experience. The importance of keeping Jewish tradition afloat so far from home is paramount. I have been in many different situations for the High Holidays, whether it is with my family in Toronto or my brotherhood [from Alpha Epsilon Pi, a Jewish fraternity] at school in Ottawa, but coming together with a small group of Jewish individuals in a country so far from home really strengthens my religious bonds," he said.

These people are a perfect example of how Jews can come together in any situation and keep tradition alive. Everyone should heed their example.

Finishing the holidays in song

As we approach the final days of Sukkot, we celebrate three days: Hoshana Rabbah, Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah – with their own unique traditions and music. Now is the perfect time to take a listen and appreciate our incredible aural heritage.

Although Hoshana Rabbah may sometimes be overlooked on the trek from Sukkot to Shmini Atzeret, the mystical day plays an important role evocative of the Yom Kippur service. The cantor dons a white kittel and chants the prayers in melodies reminiscent of the Days of Atonement. [bit.ly/song01]

Despite the sanctity of the day, it does not share the same prohibitions on work as other Jewish holidays. That's why you can watch a video taken of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as he conducted a two-hour Hoshana Rabbah service at New York City's Congregation Kehilath Jacob in 1991. [bit.ly/song02] (The technology wasn't great back then, and the video is jerky, but the audio is good.) For a more recent peek at a lively Hoshana Rabbah service, take a look at how the Happy Minyan of Los Angeles celebrates the day. [bit.ly/song03]

From there, we move on to Shmini Atzeret/Simchat Torah, celebrated for one day in Israel and for two days elsewhere. Considered a separate holiday from Sukkot, it marks the annual completion of the reading of the Torah and the celebration of its start with the story of Genesis. [bit.ly/song04]

There is a tradition to read King Solomon's Megillat Kohelet or the Book of Ecclesiastes during Sukkot. Since the first day of Sukkot fell on Shabbat this year, Kohelet will be recited on Shmini Atzeret. [bit.ly/song05]

Granted, Kohelet is not as well-known as the Megillat Esther or the Song of Songs. However, a selection from Kohelet ("To every thing there is a season, and a time to every purpose under the heaven…) did attain popular fame a in the 1960s, thanks to folksinger Pete Seeger. [bit.ly/song06] Seeger adapted the beginning of the book's third chapter to his song Turn, Turn, Turn, which the folk-rock group the Byrds recorded and made into a number 1 song. [bit.ly/song07]

For something more traditional but less familiar, listen to historic renditions of holiday melodies from the Jewish communities of Greece, Tunisia, Yemen, Georgia, Morocco, Lithuania, Bukhara, Italy and Bulgaria. [bit.ly/song13] This music is part of the online National Sound Archives at Hebrew University, which is certainly worth a longer listen.

On Shmini Atzeret, we say goodbye to the sukkah and an official hello to blustery weather, with the beautiful Prayer for Rain. Tefilat Geshem is a beautiful prayer that shows how crucial water has been to the heroes of the Torah. For example: "Remember the one [Moses] drawn forth in a bulrush basket from the water. They said, 'He drew water and provided the sheep with water.' At the time, Your treasured people thirsted for water, he struck the rock and out came water. For the sake of his righteousness, grant abundant water!" The prayer ends with the entire congregation praying, "For a blessing, not a curse. For life and not for death. For abundance, not for famine." [bit.ly/song09] Luckily, we have a recording of the legendary cantor Yossele Rosenblatt delivering this beautiful prayer and can enjoy it online today. [bit.ly/song10]

Simchat Torah is best known as the time of endings and beginnings. We complete the annual reading of the Torah, and then immediately restart at Bereshit. It also marks the annual appearance of two "bridegrooms." Two respected members of the community are called to the Torah: the Chatan Torah or "Bridegroom of the Torah" recites the blessing over the final reading from the Torah, while the "Bridegroom of Genesis" is called up for the first portion. You can listen to the traditional songs chanted in the Syrian Jewish community as the Chatan Torah [bit.ly/song11] and Chatan Breishit are called forward. [bit.ly/song12]

Have a very happy and melodic holiday.

Help Hebrew U stem Israeli brain drain, MK urges

'We need the support of friends and allies around the world'

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Likud MK Danny Danon was recently in Toronto to garner support for Hebrew University's Institute for Medical Research Israel-Canada (IMRIC), which he hopes will help "keep the brilliant people in Israel."

In May 2008, Canadian Friends of Hebrew University (CFHU), a non-profit organization that promotes and raises funds for Hebrew U, pledged to raise $50 million over eight years to support IMRIC.

The institute, housed in a new building on the Ein Kerem medical campus, is meant to encourage interdisciplinary partnerships – in some cases, between Israelis and Canadians – to help scientists better understand how to prevent and fight diseases such as cancer, Alzheimer's disease and Parkinson's disease.

Danon, a Hebrew U alumnus – he obtained a master's degree in public policy and administration – spent two days in Toronto meeting with CFHU donors and said he hopes to attract others to the cause to help keep "the brains in Israel by giving incentives to professors and researchers."

He said he was happy to offer his support to an institution that is investing in keeping Israel's brightest in Israel so that it won't cost more later on to lure them back from abroad.

"Today, with globalization, it is very easy to find a research position elsewhere. I think that by keeping them in Israel with their families, in the future those people will win Nobel Prize awards and they will be developing for the army, for security, for health, and that is the most important value," Danon said.

"Otherwise, we will pay much more for technology in the future."

He said although the Israeli government funds the university, "in terms of building the infrastructure, we need the support of friends and allies around the world."

Danon said IMRIC provides, new, better and roomier labs and more research opportunities that will help Israel keep its most promising students.

"If they have the possibility to do the research and advance their studies and professions [in Israel], they prefer to stay in Israel. But the minute they go to the U.S. or Canada, it is very hard to bring them back because they make connections, professional connections and family connections."

Before Danon entered politics, he served the Jewish Agency as a shaliach in Florida from 1994 to 1996, where he encouraged Jews to stand up against anti-Israel propaganda.

Danon, a Likudnik who said he is more right-wing than Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu, promotes the ideas, among others, that a strong Israel depends on ceasing talks to establish a Palestinian state and that Israel should declare its right to exist within its current borders, with no further surrender of territory.

Danny Danon

He said he is no longer involved with the Jewish Agency, but he continues to "promote Zionist issues as a member of Knesset."

Danon, who called himself a "strong advocate of hasbara and PR," said that those who support Israel and its institutions should "know the facts and not be shy.

"I see a lot of students or people who know the facts, who know that we are right but are shy to speak out. I am an activist myself who grew up in the Betarist movement. I was a shaliach in Florida and I met a lot of students and I heard the stories from here about York University… I would recommend that when we see someone crossing the line, we should speak out and be aggressive and not just hope that it will go away."

Danon said he hopes that people will take notice that a politician with his ideologies is advocating for a university.

He said universities usually represent a more liberal, left-wing point of view, but he hopes his promotion of Hebrew U will show the importance of the institution to right-wing supporters as well.

"I think that fact that I come from Likud, with a very strong ideology concerning the issues of Middle East peace talks and other relevant issues, coming and asking people to endorse the university, I think is important."

Global jihadists stronger today: British MP

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The threat posed by global jihadists has escalated since Islamic radicals destroyed the World Trade Center in New York City eight years ago, claims a Conservative party member of the British Parliament.

"They're more dangerous than ever," said Michael Gove, the author of Celsius 7/7: How the West's Policy of Appeasement Has Provoked Yet More Fundamentalist Terror ... And What Has To Be Done Now.

Brought to Toronto by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to speak to donors, Gove, a rising star in his right-of-centre party, has represented the riding of Surrey Heath since 2005 and has been the Conservative shadow secretary of state for children, schools and family for the past two years.

Reporting to Conservative leader David Cameron, Gove, 42, would likely be appointed to his cabinet if the Conservatives form Britain's next government.

In a recent interview, Gove, a former journalist, said that Islamists, from Hezbollah in Lebanon to the Taliban in Afghanistan, have grown stronger since the events of Sept. 11, 2001 in the United States. "Islamists are confident that the West will falter," he said. "What the West needs is able political leadership, resolution, endurance and an ability to sacrifice."

Western leaders should look to Britain's wartime prime minister, Winston Churchill, for inspiration, he noted.

Weakness and appeasement will only embolden Islamists, warned Gove, who worked for the Times and has contributed to the Spectator.

Branding Islamists as the new Nazis and Communists, Gove said that, based on their writings, they aspire to reverse the decline of the Muslim world, overthrow secular Muslim governments, establish regimes grounded in Sharia law, reclaim territory once ruled by Muslims, including Spain and Israel, and resurrect the caliphate in all its former glory.

"Their agenda is relatively transparent," said Gove.

The West can push back by vigorously combating Islamist encroachments, such as in Afghanistan, cutting off funding to extremist organizations and strengthening the voices of moderate Muslims who, he contended, are "peace-loving."

In his view, more and more Muslim moderates are speaking out against Islamic fundamentalism. "We should encourage them. They need help."

Gove claimed that a lack of will to confront Islamism, particularly before 2001, was buttressed by left-wing elements in the media and academia.

"They have a tendency to put the West in the dock for the indignities that have taken place in the Muslim world, as if the West is responsible. There's a terrible tendency to blame ourselves."

Westerners should not believe "our enemy's propaganda" that terrorism can be traced to either poverty or historical grievances, Gove declared.

The roots of terrorism are instead buried in ideological conviction, he added.

Gove argued that Islamism is a perversion of Islam, just as Nazism was a mockery of nationalism and Communism was a misapplication of socialism.

Calling for an "ethical" foreign policy to promote genuine democracy and the rule of law, he expressed confidence that democratic principles can one day take root in such authoritarian Arab regimes as Egypt.

"The desire to choose your own leaders is a universal yearning, though it's not an easy path to tread," said Gove, who said he is heartened by the growth of democracy in Iraq since the 2003 allied invasion. "The world is safer and more prosperous with democracy."

To Gove, foreign policy need not be based solely on realpolitik.

He believes that invading Iraq was "the right thing to do," although he admits that mistakes were made during the post-war era.

"Iraq under Saddam Hussein was a torture chamber. We now have a democratically elected government in Iraq."

Turning to Iran's current quest for a nuclear arsenal, Gove said Tehran can't be allowed to achieve its objective. "Iran is led by an eliminationalist anti-Semite who wants to destroy Israel. We should make it clear that it's unacceptable for Iran to acquire nuclear weapons. If Iran were a liberal democracy, then the whole nature of the debate would be different."

Asked if he would support an Israeli military strike on Iran's nuclear sites, Gove replied, "Israel has a right to take whatever steps to defend itself. Israel is uniquely vulnerable, and no option should be taken off the table."

Gove said he "completely understands" why Israel, despite its denials, maintains a nuclear force.

A member of the Conservative Friends of Israel organization, he voiced understanding of Israel's invasion of the Gaza Strip last winter. "Israel was facing a terrorist threat from Hamas. Israel was also sending a signal to Iran that it has every intention of defending itself."

A supporter of a two-state solution to resolve Israel's conflict with the Palestinians, he said, "I pray it happens, but I fear it won't happen soon. It requires a willingness by Palestinian leaders to live in peace with Israel, which I don't see."

But if a Palestinian state arises, it should be a democracy. "If it is not a proper democratic state, it'll always be a launching pad for terror and violence."

Declining to be drawn into a discussion about the future boundaries of such a state, he said, "It's not for me to say where its borders should be."

Federations collaborated to counter TIFF protest

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

By now, most people have heard about the controversy that erupted last month when hundreds of people signed a letter of protest against the Toronto International Film Festival's (TIFF) City to City Spotlight on Tel Aviv.

But what many people don't know is that it led UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to pursue a rather unusual partnership with the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles to enlist its help in mobilizing Hollywood A-listers – such as Natalie Portman, Sacha Baron Cohen, Jerry Seinfeld, Jason Alexander, Lenny Kravitz, Lisa Kudrow and Halle Berry – to counter the protest.

"Federations are co-operating with each other all the time on various issues – on marketing techniques, on fundraising techniques – but it is very rare for two federations to collaborate on an advocacy initiative, because in many cases, advocacy is local," said UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English.

"But in this case… It was more than an advocacy issue. It was a mobilization initiative that crossed time zones and national boundaries. It showed us how powerful the concern for Israel is and how deep the opposition is to the tactics of those who conspire against Israel's security and Israel's existence as a Jewish state."

In the days leading up to the festival, which ran from Sept. 10 to 19, filmmaker and York University film professor John Greyson announced that he had pulled his film from the festival to protest the decision, because he said the spotlight was "complicit in the Israeli propaganda machine."

Soon after, more than 1,500 filmmakers, entertainers and authors – including actors Viggo Mortensen and Danny Glover, and musician David Byrne – endorsed an online letter titled "The Toronto Declaration: No Celebration of Occupation," to protest the decision to celebrate Israeli culture.

This sparked a response from other celebrities to support TIFF's decision to highlight Israeli film, which left some wondering how the Hollywood stars were mobilized so quickly.

"We knew that once the Toronto Declaration was issued and published that the response would be most effective coming from members of the film industry, coming from the peers of those who were at the forefront of the Toronto Declaration," English said.

He added that because Hollywood is North America's entertainment capital, the decision to work with the Los Angeles federation "was natural" and made in less than an hour, just a day or two after the protest letter surfaced on Sept. 2. "Once that decision was made, we knew we had a very short amount of time to recruit the names."

John Fishel, outgoing president of the Los Angeles federation, said the two organizations collaborated on the text for the ad, which appeared in the Toronto Star, National Post and Variety magazine.

Titled "We don't need another blacklist," it said, "Anyone who has actually seen recent Israeli cinema, movies that are political and personal, comic and tragic, often critical, knows they are in no way a propaganda arm for any government policy. Blacklisting them only stifles the exchange of cultural knowledge that artists should be the first to defend and protect."

Fishel was excited by the number of people – about 185 – who signed on.

"We used our networks out here to get the core group, and then they started to reach out to clients and colleagues, friends and so forth, both on the talent end and behind the scenes," he said.

"The names just kept pouring in… I think up until the day [the ad] went to press, even after the deadline, people called us and wanted to be on the list."

English said the names that ran in the Star ad on Sept. 15 were rounded up in just three days.

"The speed with which all this took place showed the tremendous force of opposition to what the Toronto Declaration signers really stand for. Despite their increasingly weak attempts to say that they were not proposing a blacklist, that is exactly what they were proposing. The whole notion of a blacklist really struck an emotional chord among the entertainment industry personalities who signed our ad," he said.

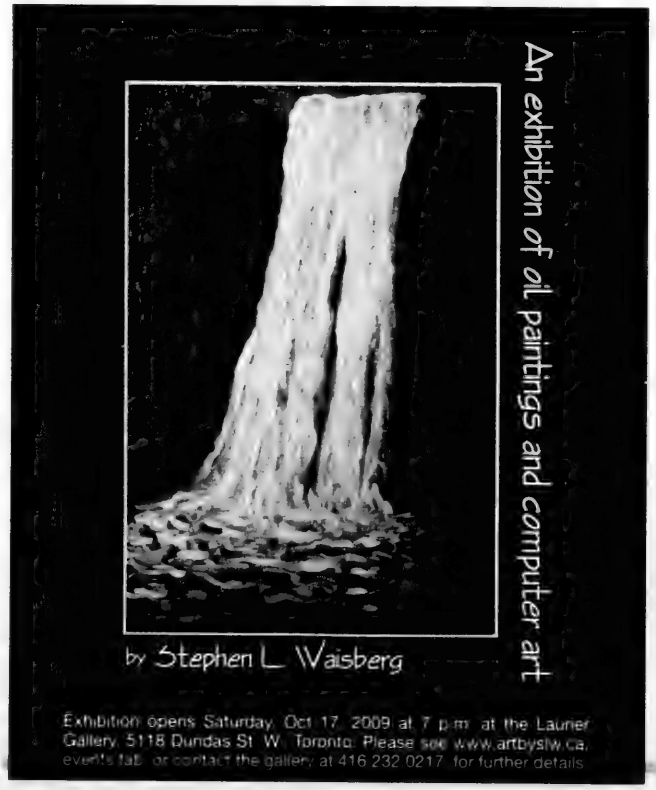
English said that in Toronto, Canadian film producer Robert Lantos' assistance in mobilizing members of the entertainment community was "invaluable."

He said Lantos, who was one of the first to speak out against the protest and wrote an article in the National Post on Sept. 11, "displayed his extraordinary dedication to this cause… In between takes on the set of Barney's Version, the movie he's producing, he was calling and e-mailing and writing and doing everything within his body and soul to help the cause."

Fishel said many celebrities support UJA and Israel, and some even donate to the cause, but they're not always willing to issue public statements of support.

"There are always exceptions to every rule, but I thought this time, because of the situation, because of the blatant falsehoods and the buzzwords in the original statement and because it looked like a censorship type of thing, it rose above the issue of the delegitimization of Israel, and we did see a phenomenal response to it."

Fishel added that if the effort to collect names had continued for another week, the number of signatories would have doubled. "I think it was a wake-up call for many of the people in the Hollywood community that it was time to stand up and be counted."



Fellowships available for Croatia leadership seminar

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The New York-based Memorial Foundation for Jewish Culture is accepting applications for the European Nahum Goldmann Fellowship, scheduled to take place in Croatia, on the island of Pag, from March 8 to 16, 2010. The deadline for applications is Nov. 30.

The fellowship – the 22nd of its kind – includes room and board, but not travel expenses. Men and women age 25 to 40 with an interest in Jewish culture and potential for individual growth and communal leadership are eligible to apply.

The theme of this year's fellowship is Trauma and Transformation: Reconstructing Jewish Culture and Communities in the Diaspora in the 21st Century.

Faculty will include, among others, Ismar Schorsch, professor of Jewish history and former chancellor of the Jewish Theological Seminary; Moshe Halbertal, professor of Jewish thought and philosophy at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem; Benjamin Ish-Shalom, rector, Beit Morasha, Jerusalem; Jerusalem-based psychologist Rina Rosenberg; and Rabbi Benjamin Lau, director of the Center for Judaism and Society, Beit Morasha, Jerusalem.

The program includes lectures, discussion groups, workshops on Jewish texts, Jewish identity and community building; cultural events; and a meeting with fellowship alumni now serving their respective communities.

There are more than 700 graduates of the program, although few are Canadians, Jerry Hochbaum, the foundation's executive vice-president, told The CJN. "We're very eager to see some Canadians there," he added.

Among the former fellows are about 60 Americans and about 200 from Russia, according to Hochbaum. Previous seminars have been held in eastern and western Europe, Australia, southeast Asia, South Africa, Latin America and Israel.

"The chief rabbi of Turkey was a fellow," he said. As well, he cited university professors, a president of the Jewish community in Stockholm, and a vice-president of the Jewish community in Sydney, Australia.

"We keep the numbers small," said Hochbaum, who developed the program. "It's a very intimate and intense experience.

"The most important part is the opportunity to meet and talk to one another about their concerns – personal, communal and professional."

Goldmann himself – a founder of the World Jewish Congress and the founder of the Memorial Foundation, who died in 1982 – "understood the need, in Europe particularly ... to prepare the next generation of leaders," Hochbaum said.

In a letter to fellowship alumni, Hochbaum wrote that by organizing the upcoming seminar in Croatia, the Memorial Foundation is "making an important statement about our responsibility to smaller Jewish communities in Europe and around the world."

CJC hails judicial review of web hate case

Compiled by CJN Staff

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) last week commended the Canadian Human Rights Commission for seeking judicial review of the decision in the case of Warman v. Lemire, which called into question the constitutionality of the Canadian Human Rights Act's (CHRA) section on online hate.

Last month, a human rights tribunal ruling in the case, which involved a number of alleged anti-Semitic and homophobic postings on administrator Marc Lemire's website, said a section of the CHRA that imposes quasi-criminal penalties is unconstitutional. The one-man tribunal, Athanasios Hadjis, said Lemire did promote hatred with an article titled "AIDS Secrets," but he wouldn't apply the provisions of the act to him.

Opponents of the CHRA's Section 13, which addresses Internet hate promotion, hailed the decision as a breakthrough, but supporters of the provision said the adjudicator's decision isn't binding and should be appealed.

The decision turned on a 1998 amendment to the CHRA that added penalty provisions to the act. The provisions, Hadjis stated, substantially altered the nature of Section 13 from being primarily "conciliatory, preventative and remedial" to more closely resembling criminal court remedies. As a result, an earlier Supreme Court ruling in the John Ross Taylor case could be revisited.

In that 1990 case, the Supreme Court ruled Section 13 was constitutional even though it violated the Charter guarantee to free expression, because its impact was minimal and, given the benefits in protecting minorities, was warranted in a free and democratic society.

But "since the 1998 amendments, [Section 13 has] lost the exclusively compensatory and preventative features that characterized it in the eyes of the majority in Taylor," Hadjis said.

Canadian Jewish Congress – an intervenor in the case, along with B'nai Brith Canada and Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center – called for an appeal. Joel Richler, Congress' honorary legal counsel, said at the time that Hadjis should have followed a well-established constitutional doctrine of "reading out" the penalty provision while applying the rest of the CHRA.

"CJC agrees that the decision of the Canadian Human Rights Tribunal in this case is based on significant errors of law. These errors raise important questions about the constitutionality of [Section 13] that require clarification," said Congress CEO Bernie Farber.

Torontonian to volunteer in rural Indian village

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Marni Wolf is no stranger to travelling and volunteering outside of Canada, but never before has she participated in a 10-month program, living and working in a rural Indian village.

"I've always really wanted to travel to India for a long, long time," said 22-year-old Wolf.

"I've taken a bunch of courses on Indian history, politics, religion, and I'm just generally interested in the culture. I also wanted to integrate into this trip a way that I could learn more about myself and have a 'two-way-street' thing."

Later this month, Wolf will be one of 10 Jewish youths – the only Canadian – who will travel to western India to work with an NGO as part of American Jewish World Service's (AJWS) World Partners Fellowship.

The fellowship is awarded to recent Jewish college graduates and young professionals who are committed to volunteering.

The 10-month program requires fellows to volunteer at separate NGOs in India, engage in educational seminars and workshops and take part in orientation and retreats.

"The program is an opportunity to learn about human rights in an international context, make valuable contributions to a grassroots organization and explore Jewish values that substantiate and motivate this work," the AJWS website said.

Wolf, a McGill University graduate who studied psychology and religion with a focus on Hinduism and Buddhism, said that while India boasts a booming information-technology industry and a growing middle class, it also struggles with high rates of child malnutrition and a poorly managed public education system.

Marni Wolf

The public health system is also weak, as the Indian government only allocates one per cent of its GDP to health care, but has plans to bump it up to two per cent in 2011.

Wolf said she is "ecstatic" to be working in Baroda, India, for an NGO called Vikalp, a 10-year-old organization that advocates for women's rights and works to improve government programs, as well as political and legal systems.

"They do a ton of different things from peer education to [improving] domestic livelihood for women in rural areas who don't really know their rights. Recently, they started a sex-worker program for women with HIV and AIDS," Wolf told The CJN before she left Toronto on Sept. 30 to travel before her stint begins at the end of this month.

"They also work to support transgender and homosexual women – I can't imagine how they are treated in India. They're just trying to promote equality."

Wolf said that she is most intrigued by a new program called Women's Court.

"The thing with the court cases in India is, let's say a woman is raped or is a victim of domestic violence and they try to get justice in the judicial system. The case will be pushed back for years and years, and even if it does come to court, justice is never served," she said.

דו"ח ארגון זכויות האדם של האו"ם

דו"ח של האו"ם על מבצע "עופרת יצוקה" שפורסם לאחרונה קובע שגם החמאס וגם ישראל ביצעו פשעי מלחמה. הדו"ח קובע בעליל שהחמאס, בהפגיזו ישובים ישראלים, ביצע פשעי מלחמה. הוא קובע גם שצה"ל, בחלק מפעולותיו, עבר על החוק הבינלאומי.

הדברים התקבלו בסערה רבה בישראל ובשלום היתתר. לדעת רובני לא היתה מלחמה יותר מוצדקת ממבצע "עופרת יצוקה". כשישראל מבלינה חודשים רבים על הפגזות עזירה על ידי החמאס בעזה בטרם היא נכנסת לפעולה צבאית. הפעולה גם מוכיחה את עצמה כיעילה, שכן החמאס מעריך רק כיתן, וכך זכה ללמוד את מה שהיה צריך לדעת מראש-שלא יתכן שילוח יהודי בשדרות לא יוכל ללמוד ולגדל בשקט.

באופן כללי-העדיפו עד כה מנהיגי ישראל וכמותם מנהיגי יהדות העולם שלא להתמודד עם פרשי הדו"ח עצמו. בעיני זו טעות. כי יש בדו"ח נקודות שכל ישראלי חייב להתמודד איתן. אביא כאן מספר דוגמאות:

חייבים לקרוא את הדו"ח ולהתמודד איתו. אבל שישאר בינינו.

לשיר לתל אביב

את נאווה היכרתי כשהיתה ילדה סקרנית וחכמה. אחותי הצעירה של חברי שלמה ארצי. לא מפליא-היא גדלה להיות סופרת מצליחה, כשהנושא העיקרי של ספריה הוא השואה מנקודת המבט של דור הבנים. גם האופרה "צחוק של עכברוש" מבוססת על סיפורה של ילדה שהתחבאה בבור עמוק בזמן השואה, כשחברה היחיד הוא עכברוש.

'This way I can really learn about the place and give something back'

"So these women from Vikalp started this court, where they literally sit under a tree, and families come from rural places in India – they'll discuss the case, take people's opinion, write it all down, send it to the court with hundreds of signatures, and they'll get it notarized by the court."

She said that this program has been so successful that other communities in India are starting courts of their own.

"What's great about this is that not only are we achieving justice faster, but… the women who are making the decisions realize how much power they can have."

Wolf, who said she has a lot of volunteer experience but has never participated in anything this long term, added that she is thrilled to have survived an intense months-long application process to be awarded the fellowship.

Wolf said the application process, which began in January, required that she write essays, obtain reference letters, undergo a two-hour telephone interview, and fly to New York for a group interview.

She said it wasn't until a month ago that she learned she'd be living and working in Baroda.

"I've travelled a lot and seen a ton of places, but this is off the tourist trail, and this way I can really learn about the place and give something back – not just money from being a tourist," she said.

"A lot of Jewish people are wealthy and give to charities and have the money to do that, but I don't have that and this is a way for me to contribute."

She said that although she's confident she'll adjust to the work and feel comfortable as a part of the Vikalp team, "I'm nervous that I'll get lonely."

She said she anticipates the biggest challenge will be getting past the language barrier.

"I took Hindi classes back in March. It was so long ago that I've almost forgotten it all, but it's just a completely different script and language," Wolf said.

"The only people who speak English there are the people in the higher class, so if I go into a rural village and I want to have a conversation with someone, my English isn't going to help me. I need to learn the language."

She said that in the days before she left, she was aiming to collect $1,800 in donations for AJWS in an effort to raise awareness about the fellowship.

"I've been speaking to a bunch of people about it, promoting it," she said, adding that she threw a dinner party for her friends and charged a cover with all proceeds going to AJWS.

"I have a bunch of cousins and family members that can donate money, but I have all these great friends that are students or unemployed and I can't ask them for money. So I figured I'd throw a party."

UJA Federation announces nominees

David Engel, nominating committee chair for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, has announced the nominees for the board of directors and individual representatives council members.

Elections will be held during UJA Federation's annual meeting on Monday, Nov. 16, 2009, at 7:30 p.m., at On The Park (1095 Leslie St., Toronto).

In accordance with the bylaws, the governance consists of a council, a board of directors and an executive committee. The board of directors, the chair and the senior vice-chair will be elected by the council members; the executive committee will be ratified by the board of directors from among the directors. No nominations can be made from the floor during the annual meeting. However, any member of the Jewish community may be placed in nomination by complying with the following bylaws:

"In order to be elected or appointed and to continue as a council member, each individual must (a) be an individual general member; (b) have made a financial commitment to the United Jewish Appeal of Greater Toronto in respect of the most recent annual campaign and be in good standing with the United Jewish Appeal in respect of such commitment; and (c) shall not have refused to remove any barrier that is within his or her control that would prevent his or her spouse's religious re-marriage."

"Each individual representative council member shall be elected at an annual general meeting by the individual general members from among the qualified candidates duly nominated therefor by the nominating committee or nominated by any seven individual general members; provided that in respect of nominations made by individual general members: (a) No individual general members may nominate more than three nominees for election as individual representative council member at any annual general meeting; (b) such nominations shall be in writing and accompanied by the written consent of the nominee; and (c) such nominations shall be delivered to the secretary at least 21 days before the annual general meeting at which the election is to occur."

Nominated for chair of the board is Alan Winer and senior vice-chair of the board is Elizabeth Wolfe. Nominees for the board of directors include:

For a two year term:

Elena Aleinikov, Michael Davis, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, Steven Farber, Jill Goldberg-Reitman, Louis Greenbaum, Warren Kimel, Elyse Lackie, Bruce Leboff, Joseph Lebovic, David Mansell, Gilbert Palter, Robert Palter, David Peltz, Craig Rimer, Ralph Shedletsky, Honey Sherman, Eileen Silver, David Spiro, Arthur Stern and Sara Zagdanski

For a one year term:

Jeffrey Cohen, Sheldon Goodman, and Shawna Granovsky

Continuing their two year term:

Barbara Bank, Austin Beutel, Stephen Cole, Glennie Lindenberg, Steve Mayer, Ran Mesterman, Morris Perlis, Elan Pratzer, Randy Shiff and Kenneth Tanenbaum

The following are to be elected for a two-year term 2009-2011 as individual representative council members:

Elena Aleinikov, Stephen Altbaum, Natan Aronshtam, Barbara Bank, Brent Belzberg, Austin Beutel, Morley Brown, Michael Buckstein, Samuel H. Cohen, Sharon Cohen, Stephen Cole, Michael Davis, Richard Diamond, Sheldon Disenhouse, William Draimin, Lisa Draper, Wendy Eisen, Ruth Ekstein, David Engel, Judy Engel, Steven Farber, Sherry Firestone, Michael Florence, Sheldon Goodman, David C. Green, David Y. Green, Robert Harlang, Alison Himel, Warren Kimel, David Koschitzky, Sarena Koschitzky, Elyse Lackie, Bruce Leboff, Joseph Lebovic, David Mansell, Steven Mayer, Michael B. Miller, Karen Morton, Clifford Orwin, Elisa Palter, Robert Palter, David Peltz, Sarah Perlis, Elan Pratzer, Joel Reitman, Craig Rimer, Ariella Rohringer, Ralph Shedletsky, Honey Sherman, Randy Shiff, Eileen Silver, Miguel Singer, David Spiro, Elaine Todres, Richard Venn, Dodi Weill, Alan Winer, Elizabeth Wolfe, Henry Wolfond, Sara Zagdanski

In addition to the individual representatives listed, each group general member of the Federation shall be entitled to two representatives on the council (group representative council members). Any group general member which has membership in good standing in excess of 100 persons residing in the Greater Toronto Area shall be entitled to one additional group representative on the council. According to the bylaws of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, organizations and associations may apply to become group general members by submitting an application that confirms that it subscribes to the objects of the UJA Federation, and promotes the United Jewish Appeal annual campaign. Applications for group general membership were solicited via mail in September 2009. All group general members must be registered with UJA Federation by Oct. 2, 2009.

FAT AND CELLULITE REDUCTION BREAKTHROUGH

Dr. Rochelle Schwartz & Dr. Sharla Lichtman are excited to introduce an innovative technology that offers non-surgical face lifts, fat & inch loss reduction and body contouring. The most advanced radio frequency (RF) device in the cosmetic market today is an Israeli-made machine powered by unique TriPollar RF technology. The Apollo, distributed by Sigmacon, has found incredible success in 55 countries across the globe and Genesis Wellness is proud to be introducing it into their North Toronto Aesthetic Clinic.

The Apollo reduces fat and cellulite, tightens skin and generates new collagen in a pain-free, non-invasive, no downtime procedure that has immediate and long-term results. It can treat virtually any body area quickly and with instant improvement. The Apollo has been well researched and praised by international doctors and is leading the way for affordable, simple cosmetic procedures. Whether it is crow's feet, saggy skin from weight loss or pregnancy, a stubborn area of fat or a double chin, the Apollo has shown significant results. With a facial treatment only 30 minutes, this simple 'walk-in, walk-out' procedure allows you to immediately return to your daily routine. The process is safe, effective and turns back the clock.

Helen Goodman ז"ל

Helen, my mother, was born in 1901 in a shtetl in Galicia (now Poland). After her mother died, when she was only 12 years old and her father was conscripted into the Austrian army at the beginning of World War I, Helen was left to raise her three younger brothers with the help of her aunt. At one point during the war the fighting raged back and forth through her shtetl. One morning she found a wounded German soldier in her garden. She gave him food and water and told us the German soldiers were more humane than the Russians.

In 1920 relatives brought Helen to New York. She found work in a box factory and studied English at night. During her courtship (by mail) between Melville, Saskatchewan and New York, Sam, my father, bragged to Helen that Melville had "three elevators". This gave Helen the impression that Melville had elevated transportation similar to New York's. What a surprise when she got there and found they were grain elevators!

During the 1930's, Sam and his brother Jack bought a bankrupt general store for 15 cents on the dollar. Their customers consisted mainly of Polish, German, Ukrainian and Hungarian speaking farmers and nearby First Nations reservations. Helen worked in the store and got along with the immigrant farmers because she spoke, most of their languages. She was very popular with the First Nations members who referred to her as "Mrs. Sam". She also dealt directly with the Dept. of Indian Affairs, in Ottawa, to collect payment for their purchases.

In the years before World War II, she sent American dollars and clothing in parcels to her family in Poland. When she learned they were not receiving them, she stopped mailing the gifts. (She knew something bad was happening in Europe).

Always, even in Broadview, Helen kept a kosher home. Kosher meat was sent by train from Winnipeg and if the train was late the ice melted and the meat was thrown out.

We were the only Jews in town yet we made a good living and got along well with everyone.

Helen's bravery was apparent when she lost her darling Pearl who died at the age of 21, six weeks after contracting a very virulent form of tuberculosis. Helen said she would gladly have died in Pearl's place.

In 1953, she became the superintendent of an apartment building my parents purchased when they moved to Toronto to be near to me. Helen was a philanthropic person who gave generously to all who asked. She joined Na'amat and continued to support Israel and Toronto Jewish causes.

Helen never missed a Shabbat at the Beth Sholom Synagogue where she was befriended by the late Rabbi Monson. After my father's death in 1985, Rabbi Monson got Helen into the National Council of Jewish Women's new building and she lived there until she was 91. My mother, at age 90 was still making shabbos dinners, resplendent with candles and a pure white tablecloth for my wife Shirley and me.

At age 91 Helen went into the Baycrest Home for the Aged because of their religious heritage and, I quote, "she wouldn't have to die alone". She passed away in August, 2008 at the age of 107.

Helen was a strong, independent person ahead of her time.

Cabby's day in court postponed until spring

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The fate of the Jewish items that Cote St. Luc cabby Arieh Perecowicz refuses to take out of his taxi won't be known until next spring.

After a day of proceedings on Sept. 29, the municipal court judge decided to put aside four full days for trial: April 21-22 and June 7-8, 2010. The trial was supposed to take three days of the court docket last week, but only one day was scheduled.

"It is going very slowly," conceded Perecowicz, who has racked up over $1,400 in fines for allegedly breaking regulation Number 98 of the Bureau du Taxi's bylaws barring vehicles from having items in them not considered "necessary for service" (CJN, Oct. 1).

The case has drawn attention worldwide because 65-year-old Perecowicz, a cabby for 43 years, says he has every right, based on the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, to carry a photo of the late Lubavitcher Rebbe and two mezuzot in his vehicle. But the Bureau wants them out, along with some other non-religious items.

Perecowicz said the media were well represented in the courtroom.

He has also brought the case before the Quebec Human Rights Commission.

Perecowicz was feeling confident following the day of proceedings that his case will at least be heard. The trial, he said, will involve testimony from the individual inspectors who issued each of the tickets.

The prosecution is trying to argue the case that his taxi is "dirty" and that the items present a hazard to the public, Perecowicz said.

Perecowicz agreed that it is somewhat absurd that taxpayers are being obliged pick up the high cost of such a trial, but added that the onus is on the Bureau.

"It's an enormous cost to the public," he said. "Ninety-nine point nine per cent of other people getting such a ticket would have paid and removed the items.

"I'm doing this for the ones who could have been there instead of me. I'm losing money, but I feel an obligation to do it."

3 shuls hit by vandalism in the same night

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The executive director of Congrégation Sépharade Beth Rambam in Cote St. Luc thinks there's "definitely" a connection between the vandalism at his and two other nearby synagogues the night of Sept. 24-25 and a similar incident 10 days earlier in St. Laurent.

It "seemed organized," Guy Hadad said "It is upsetting and worrying."

At Beth Rambam, a front entrance pane of glass was shattered, as was one at Beth Israel Beth Aaron Congregation a few minutes away and at nearby Congrégation Or Hahayim, all apparently within a 20-minute span.

On Sept. 14, vandals broke two windows at Petah Tikva synagogue in St. Laurent.

In Cote St. Luc, Beth Israel appears to have been the first hit at 11:46 p.m., the synagogue's spiritual leader, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, said, followed by Beth Rambam eight minutes later and Or Hahayim a few minutes after that, leading police to believe that the vandalism was committed by the same person or persons

"We can assume that," said Cmdr. Sylvain Bissonette of police station 9 in Cote St. Luc. "It was all the same modus operandi."

Hadad said a window at Beth Rambam "exploded" at exactly "12:03:23" a.m. on Sept. 25 at his Westminster Avenue synagogue, according to a video from a surveillance camera that monitors the front entrance.

"We see a car arrive," he said, "and two or three seconds later, we see the window explode."

Hadad is convinced a special tool that "punches" glass to break it was used, but Bissonette said individual projectiles – rocks – were recovered from all three synagogues.

Bissonette said none of the synagogues was actually entered, nor was any other property damaged or stolen.

Rabbi Poupko, who co-chairs Federation CJA's community security co-ordinating committee, said police responded promptly.

As well, he said, they "delivered on their promise that there would be extra patrols around Yom Kippur [a few days later]."

"Obviously, people are disturbed by it," Rabbi Poupko added. "These are cowards who under the cover of darkness throw stones at buildings... insignificant people who do significant damage.

"It is certainly disturbing that houses of worship would be targeted during the holiest week of the Jewish calendar."

According to Bissonette, all three synagogues had surveillance cameras, but because of the nighttime conditions, the images from them were obscure. "We saw a form, but didn't recognize anyone," he said.

In all three cases, congregants arriving for morning prayers on Sept. 25 discovered the broken glass.

Moshe Ben-Shach, the director of operations at Federation CJA in chargé of the security at community institutions, visited the three shuls the day after the vandalism and has been consulting with police. He said the community is working "very closely" with authorities on the case

On Sept. 25, Ben-Shach's office issued a community security alert to synagogue and Jewish institutional and school administrators, noting that "video footage" had been "collected and secured."

"The police have assured us that the investigation of these incidents will be pursued promptly," the alert said. "Local police... as well as municipal public security services were briefed and they will increase their vigilance and patrols during the coming high holidays around all Jewish institutions."

Rabbi Reuben Poupko

Bissonette told The CJN that even under normal circumstances, security is bolstered and surveillance increased around Jewish institutions during the High Holiday period

Despite the absence of swastikas or other markings, Rabbi Poupko said he believed the attacks were more than just vandalism.

"Generally speaking, no matter what we feel in our gut and intuitively, we're reluctant to declare it anti-Semitic unless it's accompanied by graffiti," he said

"However, when three synagogues are targeted in the same night, and those are the only buildings that are targeted, that certainly paints the picture for itself."

In St. Laurent, Petah Tikvah's executive director Simone Felece felt the attack on her synagogue was mere vandalism, but president Nissim Amar said he believed there could be more sinister motives behind it.

"There were other buildings 50 yards away. Why did they break only [our windows]?" Amar asked.

In an apparently unrelated incident, Michael Crelinsten, executive director of the YM-YWHA Ben Weider JCC, confirmed that a broken window was discovered "three or four weeks back" at the entrance to the Y's George Reinitz Wrestling Centre on Mountain Sights Avenue.

Police were also notified about that incident, Crelinsten said, but whoever did it "left no graffiti, nothing."

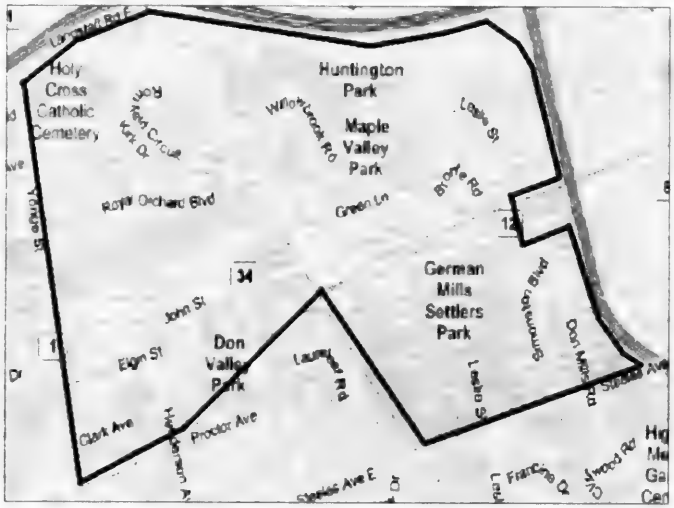
Markham now part of Toronto eruv

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community in Markham, Ont., is now within the Toronto eruv, as of mid-September.

The completion of the project, which represents an extension of the Toronto eruv, marks the end of a 13-year period when the area east of Yonge Street and north of Steeles Avenue – Toronto's northern limit – didn't have an approved boundary within which observant Jews could carry items or push a stroller or wheelchair on Shabbat.

The addition of Markham improves the entire Toronto eruv, because the new eastern and northern borders (along highways 404 and 407 respectively) now rely more on walls and fences that serve as highway and railway safety barriers, instead of relying on hydro poles, said Rabbi Avraham Plotkin, spiritual leader of Chabad Lubavitch of Markham.



The Markham eruv extension

Rabbi Plotkin, whose synagogue spearheaded the eruv effort over the past couple of years, said the project's cost was approximately $18,000. More than half that amount – about $10,000 – went toward adjustments to existing hydro poles.

Work included completion of the "walls" that form the eruv by creating so-called "doorways" using hydro poles and strong nylon wire attached on top of them.

"The poles are like the doorposts, and the wire becomes like the lintel of the door," said Rabbi Plotkin.

A committee of about a dozen people was involved in the eruv project. In addition to financing – some of which Thornhill's Shaar Shalom Synagogue helped with – approval was needed from the Town of Markham in order to proceed, Rabbi Plotkin said.

"We're very excited," the rabbi said. The completion of the new eruv provides "an opportunity for many more young families to move into the area," he added. "It makes it much more easy for families to be able to keep Shabbat."

The area has a Jewish population of about 12,000, with about 370 families belonging to Chabad Lubavitch of Markham, according to Rabbi Plotkin.

For the rabbi himself, the new eruv means, among other things, that he can carry his tallit on Shabbat instead of wearing it. A more challenging issue has been bringing the Plotkins' special-needs child to shul. In the past, they would manage as best they could, or engage the services of a non-Jewish person, he said.

"The eruv is very liberating."

Toronto's eruv – which dates back to 1922 and has been updated several times since then – used to include the Markham area. However, it was excluded in 1996 when Toronto's eruv committee, in consultation with Rabbi Shlomo Miller, rosh kollel of Toronto's Kollel Avreichim, sought to establish an eruv that didn't rely on heterim (special halachic authorizations), according to the website of the Toronto eruv.

The eruv is checked weekly to ensure that it is intact. Its status can be verified online at torontoeruv.org, or by calling 416-350-2879.

York president moves to implement report

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

York University president Mamdouh Shoukri says he agrees with virtually every recommendation made by York's Task Force on Student Life, Learning and Community and is in the process of implementing changes that he hopes will provide students with an environment "free from intimidation, abuse, free from racism and anti-Semitism."

The task force submitted its 26-page report to Shoukri on Aug. 31. He released his response to it last week.

The 13-member task force, which was chaired by York vice-president academic and provost Patrick Monahan, and included six students and six faculty members, was founded in March in response to the increasing tensions on campus between pro-Israel and anti-Israel students.

The recommendations included creating a committee to promote open discussion and debate, creating more and better student space on campus, expanding the Student Code of Conduct to include student rights, and providing better enforcement of university policies relating to the use of space on campus.

In general, Jewish community groups were pleased with the task force report, but some expressed disappointment that the report didn't make specific reference to anti-Semitism or the fact that an incident at York on Feb. 11 involved a group of Jewish students who were huddled inside Hillel's offices while other students chanted anti-Israel slogans.

In an interview with The CJN, Shoukri said that although he has no idea what "went through the minds of the committee when they were doing the drafting… I can tell you that when someone uses the word racism, they also mean anti-Semitism.

"I know anti-Semitism is a special issue that has certain historic connotations, and I certainly never disagreed with the fear of it being on the rise. There is zero tolerance of any form of racism and zero tolerance of any form of anti-Semitism," he said.

Mamdouh Shoukri

In his response to the report, which addressed each of the 40 recommendations one by one, Shoukri approved the creation of a Standing Committee on Campus Dialogue to "foster an inclusive exploration of important public issues from the widest possible range of perspectives."

He also commissioned York's vice-president of students, Robert Tiffin, to explore the creation of an intergroup relations program, as well as to participate in the Canadian Community for Dialogue and Deliberation conference to be held in Toronto this month, and to develop an annual award "to recognize a student who demonstrates a strong commitment to fostering intercultural awareness and constructive dialogue between students."

As well, Shoukri addressed the need for more student space for studying and socializing, particularly the recommendation that the open-concept Vari Hall rotunda, popular among student activists for staging protests and demonstrations, be converted into a student lounge area with "food service(s), cultural displays, information services, or a forum for debate and dialogue."

"I think [Vari Hall] can be used as a wonderful gathering space for students to socialize or share things, but we're also talking about making sure that there is enough space around for students to debate and rally and so on," Shoukri told The CJN.

"We're not imposing on the students' freedom to be active, but at the same time, it's time to maximize the space for the benefit of the students… The committee came up with the idea of making sure there is an outdoor space for [rallies]. I'm happy with that. I think it's a great idea."

Shoukri's response to the report also focused on York's "temporary use of university space" policy, which students must follow to book space on campus for events and demonstrations.

He said York has developed an online process for space bookings that is expected to be operational by next month.

In an effort to improve on York's Student Code of Conduct, Shoukri said that a panel consisting of students, faculty and staff will be established this month to review the code, as well as to amend it to include student rights and rename it the Student Code of Rights and Responsibilities (SCRR). The review will be completed by the end of April.

"The code itself was about to be reviewed anyway this year, so we are proceeding with that and we are going to change the name of it and create a list of rights for the students," he told The CJN. "The most important thing for us will be implementing the code."

Shoukri, who said that his goal is to "make absolutely sure that we have an environment here that supports learning and personal development for the students and an environment that is free from intimidation, abuse, free from racism, and anti-Semitism," added that he's pleased the task force focused on enforcement and security on campus.

Endorsing another task force recommendation, Shoukri said that when violations of the space usage policy occur, York security will ask that the activities cease or a notice of violation will be issued. A report will then be filed and followed up by the appropriate office. He expects to have this system in place by Nov. 15.

If students violate the new SCRR, security will file a report on the incident and notify York's Office of Student Community and Leadership Development, which is charged with enforcing York's current code of conduct.

Shoukri said he rejected the idea of appointing special constables – who would have the authority of police officers within the confines of York's campus – because the task force offered ways to make York's security more effective.

"In my heart of hearts, I think York's biggest problem was not the way we have organized our security forces. I honestly believe it's an issue of enforcement," Shoukri said.

Regarding "non-community members" – people who are not York students, faculty or staff – Shoukri accepted the task force's recommendation that outside interest groups shouldn't be allowed to demonstrate on campus.

The task force urged that non-students who "engage in disruption of university business or activities… be warned and subsequently [cited for trespassing] if they violate university regulations."

Shoukri stressed that York is still a welcoming place for Jews, adding that "when you look at the list of the things this university is committed to that are of direct benefit to the Jewish community, I think people should realize that we'll always be welcoming to not only the Jewish community, but all communities."

Matan Hazanov, president of Hillel at York, said that his group "has a good relationship with the university administration" and is "pleased that they're moving forward with some of the recommendations [in the task force report], and we look forward to working with them as they address all the recommendations in the future."

He said he was most pleased about the recommendation that York security have the authority to hand down notices of violation on the spot. He said he's also optimistic about finding a better use for Vari Hall.

JGH's palliative care earns international honours

Compiled by CJN Staff

MONTREAL — The seamless integration of palliative care and medical oncology has garnered another round of international and local accolades for the Jewish General Hospital (JGH), with particular recognition for the activities of the division of palliative care and its chief, Dr. Bernard J. Lapointe.

Close co-ordination between the division and the JGH Segal Cancer Centre is beneficial to patients, says the European Society for Medical Oncology (ESMO), which is once again recognizing the Segal Cancer Centre as a Designated Centre of Integrated Oncology and Palliative Care.

In addition, Lapointe has been appointed director of palliative care in McGill University's oncology department, where he has also been named to the Eric M. Flanders Chair in Palliative Medicine.

"The progressive initiatives of Dr. Lapointe and the division of palliative care are ideal examples of why the Segal Cancer Centre has become a leading referral centre for patients from across Montreal and throughout Quebec," said Dr. Hartley Stern, JGH executive director.

"The integrated approach of the Segal Cancer Centre is designed to meet the full range of patients' needs – not just physical, but emotional. These are supported and complemented by palliative care, whose activities have been creatively broadened by Dr. Lapointe to be more than an end-of-life service."

Reaccreditation of the Segal Cancer Centre was formally announced by the ESMO at its 34th Multidisciplinary Congress, held last month. The centre was the only North American facility of its kind to receive ESMO accreditation when it was originally designated for a three-year term in 2006.

In gaining this recognition, it joined a health-care network comprising thousands of oncology professionals in more than 100 countries.

In 2006 and again this year, the Segal Cancer Centre demonstrated – through a rigorous application process that examined 13 criteria – that it provides comprehensive palliative services as part of its routine care.

Cancer centre designed to meet full range of patients' needs

This approach is in keeping with the ESMO's multidisciplinary commitment to cancer prevention, diagnosis, treatment and supportive and palliative care.

"The large interdisciplinary team that surrounds patients in the palliative care unit is dedicated to offering continuity of care," Lapointe said. Oncologists, nurses and health-care professionals with expertise in oncology, including physiotherapists, psychotherapists, pharmacists and nutritionists, work collaboratively to provide patients and their families with ongoing support, information and counselling.

"We're there from the beginning," Lapointe said. "Cancer patients and their families see us very early on, often directly after diagnosis. Since our presence and involvement are central to the process, the oncologic and palliative teams operate in the same space, and our ambulatory clinics are physically integrated.

"We are partners in care, which is pretty unique. The goal is to enhance patients' quality of life and ensure they are not isolated in silos of cancer care or end-of-life care. This is the vision we hold at the Segal Cancer Centre – an approach that we see coming for programs across the country."

"The program that Dr. Lapointe has helped build at the JGH should serve as a model for other programs," said Dr. Gerald Batist, director of the Segal Cancer Centre and the Centre Monda de Gunzburg Professor and Chair in McGill's Department of Oncology.

"This level of integration of the interdisciplinary palliative care team into the various other aspects of cancer care is the optimal approach. The ESMO designation represents a remarkable accomplishment, since it is made by an internationally recognized panel of experts that is examining programs across the world."

Lapointe's leadership in the field of palliative care has also been recognized locally, with his nomination in July to the Eric M. Flanders Chair in Palliative Medicine at McGill University. Lapointe, past president of the Association des soins palliatifs du Québec and of the Canadian Palliative Care Association, is only the second person to hold the chair, which was created in 1994.

He succeeds Dr. Balfour Mount, considered the "father of palliative care in Canada."

"The nomination is very humbling," Lapointe said. "I feel very honoured to be able to occupy the chair. I look forward to further strengthening the academic and research programs in palliative care at McGill in the upcoming years."

In this anniversary year, the Jewish General Hospital has redoubled its commitment to ensuring that patients receive care of the highest quality in a clean, safe environment. The JGH has been able to deliver these pioneering and innovative services by strengthening its role as a McGill University teaching hospital, expanding and upgrading its facilities, and pursuing cutting-edge studies at the Lady Davis Institute for Medical Research. SHUL VISIT

Students at Or Haemet Sephardic School recently had the opportunity to visit the Abir Yaakob Synagogue at the Sephardic Kehila Centre and learn about the structure of the synagogue and the process of writing a sefer Torah.

STUDENTS REMEMBER: Students from United Synagogue Day School took part in the annual community Holocaust Yizkor service in Earl Bales Park, led by the Canadian Society for Yad Vashem. The theme this year was recalling the 1.5 million children who died in the Shoah. The USDS students paid tribute by reading names, blowing the shofar and laying wreaths. Pictured, from left, are Jennifer Taras, Sydney Kerzner, Sid Lichtenstein, Adam Brunder, Josh Nash, Dara Poizner, Talia Abramsky, Bailey Solomon and Gabby Lieberman.

Sweets to enjoy as we conclude the holidays

By RIVKA TAL

Webster's New World College Dictionary defines Kiddush as "a prayer recited over wine or bread on the eve of or on the day of the Sabbath or of a festival so as to set the day apart as holy." The Torah refers to two requirements concerning Shabbat and festivals — to keep them and to remember them (shamor and zachor). One must "keep" the Sabbath or yom tov by refraining from 39 forbidden activities, and one must "remember" it through the Kiddush blessings.

Kiddush is recited on the eve and day of Shmini Atzeret and Simchat Torah, as on every Shabbat and yom tov, and it's a wonderful opportunity for family and friends to get together, especially if you have the custom of reciting the blessings in the sukkah – either at the synagogue sukkah or at a sukkah in a private home. Young and old can admire the beautiful handmade-by-little-children seven species of the Land of Israel posters, dried or real pomegranate motifs strung from the ceiling, professional artwork or coloured lights.

Wine or grape juice and some baked treats complete the picture.

Whether you recite the Kiddush in the sukkah or in the house, you can enjoy these treats afterward.

APPLE COFFEE CAKE

1 cup warm water
1 envelope fast-acting yeast
3 1/4 cups flour, sifted (divided)
2 eggs
1/2 cup margarine, at room temperature
1 cup sugar and 1 tbsp. sugar (divided)
1/2 tsp. salt
2 tbsp. margarine, melted and cooled
3 cups thinly sliced peeled and cored apples
1 2 tsp. cinnamon

Place warm water in a large mixing bowl. Sprinkle with yeast and stir to dissolve. Stir in 1-1 2 cups flour. Beat until smooth.

Cover and let rise until doubled in size, about 1 hour.

Punch down. Add eggs, one at a time, beating well after each addition. Stir in 1/2 cup room-temperature margarine, 1/2 cup sugar, salt and remaining flour. Beat well.

Spread dough in a lightly greased 8-inch square baking pan. Spoon 2 tablespoons melted and cooled margarine and 1 tablespoon sugar over dough. Cover and let rise until double in size.

Preheat oven to 375. Press sliced apples into dough, distributing evenly. Combine cinnamon and remaining 1 2 cup sugar. Sprinkle over apples.

Bake for 40-45 minutes until golden and beginning to pull away from sides of pan.

COFFEE COCONUT CLUSTERS

Easy and delicious as well as handy to serve in the sukkah, since no last-minute cutting is involved.

1 cup chocolate chips
1 oz. margarine
1 tsp. espresso powder
3/4 cup flaked coconut

Melt chocolate chips with margarine in a double boiler over low heat or in microwave. Remove from heat and stir in espresso powder and coconut.

Let cool a few minutes. Form into 1-inch balls and place in fluted cups.

SACHER TORTE COOKIES

Easy, elegant, delicious.

1 cup margarine, softened
1 package (3.9 oz.) instant chocolate pudding mix
1 egg
2 cups flour, sifted
1/4 cup sugar
1 2 cup apricot preserves (substitute strawberry, raspberry or mixed fruit jelly)
Optional glaze
1/3 cup chocolate chips
1 tbsp. margarine

Cream margarine and pudding mix in a large mixing bowl. Beat in egg. Add flour and stir until thoroughly combined.

Preheat oven to 325. Shape dough into 1-1/4-inch balls. Roll in 1 4 cup sugar. Place 2 inches apart on parchment paper-lined baking sheets. Gently press thumb in the centre of each ball to make an indentation.

Bake for 15-18 minutes until firm but not dark. Remove from baking sheets and cool on wire rack.

Fill indentations with preserves. For optional glaze: melt chocolate chips and margarine in a small saucepan over very low heat, stirring constantly. Remove from heat and cool slightly.

Toronto musician develops an international fan base through YouTube

By CARA EDELL
Special to The CJN

His music has been played on radio and television, he's won a car for his songwriting skills, and his Internet exposure has made him popular among fans as far as Norway, but Rafe Malach won't let success get to his head.

While his songs have attracted attention, especially among his YouTube followers, Malach, 24, says becoming the next big thing is not his main priority.

"My goal is just to spread my music to people who like it, not to be a superstar. If I can gradually grow my fan base for a long time, and always have people that are excited to hear my stuff, that's what will matter most to me in the long run," he says.

"I don't want to be a flash-in-the-pan or a one-hit wonder. Even if I don't make any money off my music, if people legitimately connect to my songs, I will feel a sense of accomplishment."

A solo artist who has named his act Trick of Disaster, Malach writes and sings his own lyrics and plays the keyboard and guitar. His music is a mixture of acoustic, pop and punk styles.

Now in law school, he says music will always be his passion, but Malach knows it is important to be realistic about the industry and how rare it is to become famous.

"I think people get too caught up with trying to make it. You'll see a band on MuchMusic and you won't realize that two months ago they were nothing, and in two months, they'll probably be nothing," he said.

"People say, 'Do what you love and what you're passionate about,' but that doesn't necessarily mean it has to be your source of income. If you love music, you can still pursue it without putting pressure on yourself that you have to make money doing it. I know professional songwriters who are sick of writing songs. Those people could have become lawyers and written songs they actually liked."

Malach says he has written about 70 songs and takes pride in his consistent progress. Since beginning to make his talent public more than a decade ago at camp, he has noticed a significant evolution in his creative abilities. He says his song Where Was Superman, a tribute to the tragedy of Sept. 11, is what really got him noticed.

"I played it at my camp's talent show, and soon afterwards every kid could sing it. It became so popular that I recorded it in a studio. One thing lead to another, and I was, all of a sudden, in Nashville working with a producer."

Malach says he took a big leap as an artist once he embraced his potential and enrolled in a songwriting workshop. He began penning the lyrics he still uses today and became more piano-based and upbeat.

When his Grade 12 rabbinics teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto assigned his class a project titled "Why Be Jewish?" Malach says he could only approach the assignment musically.

"It made the most sense to me to answer the question as a song."

The chorus lyrics are, "When it seems like your neighbours are glaring at you /The nation that heaven forgot /Just buck up your chin and put on a grin /Why be Jewish? Well, why the hell not?"

"My teacher loved it, so I put it on YouTube and got 40,000 hits."

As Malach's skill at writing songs developed, he applied for a grant through FACTOR (The Foundation Assisting Canadian Talent on Recording) and was awarded $2,000 toward recording a demo.

Malach turned to Jake Gold, a former Canadian Idol judge who he once interned for, to provide professional guidance.

He says Gold set him up with a producer who manages the Canadian rock band the Cliks.

Malach says he considered forming a band a year ago, when an opportunity arose that required a group audition, although the experience further convinced him that he is better off on his own.

After seeing an ad for bands to perform on the MuchMusic reality show disBand, Malach and two other musicians got together and applied without even practising together, and got the gig to perform live on television. In the end, the trio did not succeed in impressing the judges, but Malach gained recognition from his on-air appearance.

"I decided I'd rather be solo, maintaining my unique sound and identity. I sent in one of my songs to [radio broadcaster] Alan Cross from 102.1 The Edge, which proved to be more worthwhile.

"The song got played, and Cross said I won't be indie for long. He thinks I'll eventually get signed. That gives me credibility."

Malach says his most recent claim to fame is when he entered a social media contest and used his musical creativity to score a car. This past summer, he wrote a song about the Nissan Cube and was one of 50 winners across Canada to receive the brand-new vehicle.

"The idea was that all the shapes were gathering around and making fun of the cube for having ambitions to become a car. They all told the cube he couldn't do it, and he proved them wrong."

Malach says the majority of his fan base comes from YouTube and is international. He was once told by a teenager in Norway that a group of 17 friends get together every few days to listen to Malach's new material.

"I have a relatively young audience, and I'm more successful online as opposed to live,' he said. "I'm focusing on growing my e-mail list and staying in touch with my fans. I like to send out one free song every week to keep people interested."

Malach's Myspace page is always buzzing, with his songs being played up to 200 times per day. Check out his tunes at www.myspace.com/trickofdisaster and at www.itunes.com/trickofdisaster.

'Pledges of co-operation must be fulfilled'

As a result of the Geneva meeting, Obama said that although Iran has agreed to co-operate with the IAEA, it now needs to "grant unfettered access" to its Qom facility, so that agency inspectors can probe it by the end of next week.

IAEA director general Mohammed ElBaradei said Sunday in Tehran that the Vienna-based nuclear watchdog organization will inspect the previously undisclosed enrichment site on Oct. 25.

IAEA director general Mohammed ElBaradei

As a result of the Geneva meetings, Iran has also agreed "in principle" to ship out most of its enriched uranium for reprocessing in Russia and France.

"Pledges of co-operation must be fulfilled. We have made it clear that we will do our part to engage the Iranian government on the basis of mutual interests and mutual respect, but our patience is not unlimited," Obama said.

While all this diplomatic activity unfurls, many in the pro-Israel community are not yet convinced the fallout from Geneva will lead to any real progress.

Shimon Fogel, CEO of the Canada-Israel Committee, fears that Iran is only buying time.

He said the Iranian regime has proved adept at engaging with the international community simply as a "stall tactic."

Speaking to the IAEA-scheduled inspection of the Qom site, Fogel said that while this is a positive first step, "it has to translate into something meaningful, both in terms of Iran's compliance with the expectations of the international community, but as well… for the international community to address this in ways that do not allow Iran off the hook."

Fogel said his organization would like to see the international community use more "coercive" engagement tactics instead of the "co-operative" ones that have so far led to no real progress on stopping Iran's pursuit of nuclear weapons.

Last week, Canadian customs officials seized materials they believed were being illegally shipped to Iran for use in its alleged nuclear weapons program.

George Webb, head of the Canada Border Service Agency's Counter Proliferation Section, said centrifuge parts, programmable logic controllers and a shipment of microchips that appear to be some type of guidance system are among the materials that customs officials intercepted, according to an article in the National Post.

Webb also said that Canada recently identified a new port in the Persian Gulf, Ras al-Khaimah, that is being used to ship goods to Iran. The port is technically in the United Arab Emirates but is controlled by Iran. Webb said Canadian customs officers are looking for goods destined for the port.

"All of our people in those ports are aware," he said, "so as soon as they see [a suspicious item], it's hauled aside for examination and follow up."

The Canada-Israel Committee praised the job done by Webb and his staff.

"The Canadian record has been extraordinary in interdicting and intercepting all those shipments, and continues to be," Fogel said, praising Canadian authorities for helping not make Canada an "easy target" for the smuggling of these items.

Ahmadinejad born Jewish: report

JTA

LONDON — Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad was born to a Jewish family that converted to Islam when he was four years old, according to a British newspaper.

The Daily Telegraph reported the discovery Saturday, based on Ahmadinejad's original family name of Sabourjian.

The newspaper published a picture of Ahmadinejad holding up his identity card during last year's election campaign in a way that shows his family's previous name. The article said Sabourjian is a common Iranian Jewish name, especially among those from Aradan, where the Iranian president was born.

The paper said the name means cloth weaver, or specifically tallit weaver. It adds that the word "sabour" means tallit, and the suffix "jian" indicates his family were practicing Jews.

Ahmadinejad has never denied that his family changed its name when it moved to Tehran in the 1950s, but he has never stated the family's original name.

However, a report on the Guardian's website disputed the claim. Citing Israeli experts and its own reporters, the paper said the word "sabour" doesn't mean tallit and that Sabourjian isn't a well-known Jewish name. It it also said "jian" is a common suffix in Muslim names.

The report said the name "derives from thread painter sabor in Farsi – a once-common and humble occupation," and the name was likely changed to avoid being identified with the lowly carpet-weaving trade in Aradan.

The Guardian reported that Ahmadinejad's father was a Shia Muslim who taught the Qur'an before and after the family's move to Tehran. Also, his mother was known as a Seyyede, a title given to women believed to be direct descendants of the Prophet Muhammad.

Palestinian prisoners exchanged for Schalit video

By JACK KHOURY
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd

JERUSALEM — Israel last week completed an exchange of 20 Palestinian women prisoners for a videotape that provided the first visible evidence that abducted Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit is still alive.

The German- and Egyptian-mediated swap has stirred expectations that a deal can soon be reached to release Schalit in exchange for a wider Israeli prisoner amnesty, but officials on both sides said there was still some hard bargaining ahead.

In the two-minute videotape, Schalit looked healthy and sounded coherent. In a proof-of-life gesture by Hamas, he held up a copy of an Arabic-language newspaper dated Sept. 14.

For Schalit's release, Hamas has demanded that Israel free hundreds of Palestinians from its prisons, including many jailed for involvement in suicide bombings and lethal shootings. More than 10,000 Palestinians are incarcerated in Israel.

The London-based pan-Arab daily Asharq al-Awsat reported on Sunday that a dispute over the release of Israeli Arab and east Jerusalem prisoners as delaying the conclusion of a prisoner exchange between Israel and Hamas aimed at securing Schalit's release.

According to the report, Hamas is insisting that Israel release most of the prisoners from east Jerusalem, as well as those who are Israeli citizens, since the vast majority of them have been jailed for a long time, and some of them even belong to Hamas.

However, Israel has refused to release these prisoners, saying that releasing Israeli citizens would create a dangerous precedent.

The newspaper further reported that the German mediator accompanying the swap talks has suggested replacing these prisoners with Arab prisoners, but Hamas rejected the proposal.

However, the report continued, Israel has agreed to release all the prisoners on Hamas' list who are from Gaza and the West Bank, among them Hamas military commanders. Hamas, for its part, has agreed to deport some of these prisoners to Arab nations and to Europe.

In a separate story, Asharq al-Awsat quoted a senior Israeli defence official as saying that Israel knows exactly where Schalit is being held captive, and that the location is under constant Israeli surveillance.

According to the report, the official said that if Israel so desired it could take the risk and storm the place, but the fear that Schalit might get hurt is preventing Israel from launching such an operation.

Hamas is aware of the fact that Israel knows where Schalit is held, the paper reported, and has consequently surrounded the location with explosives. Hamas has also issued a directive to kill Schalit if an Israeli attack is sensed, the paper said.

The above poster reads 'I volunteered into the army of the Friends of Gilad Schalit.' [Flash90]

The paper said these remarks were made during an informal discussion surrounding the prisoner exchange talks.

Asharq al-Awsat further reported that one of the individuals present in the discussion said, "Since we knew exactly where the secret Iranian nuclear reactor was before any western intelligence body, and we knew about the Syrian reactor, is it logical that we wouldn't know where Schalit is?"

"We know where he is, but don't want to repeat the scenario of the evacuation of the soldier Nachshon Wachsman," he said. Wachsman was kidnapped by Hamas in 1994 and was killed during an Israeli attempt to rescue him.

On Friday, senior Hamas official Mahmoud al-Zahar said that Schalit will be set free within weeks or two months at most, suggesting that the Islamic group might show greater flexibility in upcoming negotiations.

Israeli officials said Friday's completion of a swap of 20 female Palestinian prisoners for a recent videotape of Schalit was the first stage in a bigger effort by Israel, Hamas and German mediators.

In an interview with the German weekly Der Spiegel, Zahar said his organization seeks to wrap up negotiations as soon as possible.

Aviva Schalit, Gilad's mother, told friends on Saturday that she hoped that a videotape showing her son alive in Hamas custody signals "the beginning of the end of his captivity."

She spoke Saturday, one day after Israel obtained the video from Hamas.

However, Noam Schalit, Gilad's father, looked to quell any expectation that the release of the tape was indicative of an imminent deal for his release.

"We're concerned," Schalit said, speaking outside his home Saturday in the Galilee community of Mitzpeh Hila. "Gilad looks like someone who isn't at a picnic or a convalescent home."

Schalit received a telephone call earlier Saturday from French President Nicolas Sarkozy. The Schalit family holds dual Israeli-French citizenship. During the phone call, Sarkozy inquired into Gilad's health.

Debate on Goldstone report deferred to March

JTA

JERUSALEM — Palestinian diplomatic efforts to advance within the United Nations system Richard Goldstone's report charging Israel and Hamas with war crimes have been deferred until March.

The Palestinian Authority representatives had garnered sufficient support among the 47 nations on the UN Human Rights Council to win the council's endorsement for a resolution they had authored on the report, but failed to win the backing of the United States and other western nations. Without such backing, the Palestinian resolution stood little chance of consideration by the UN Security Council, the only UN body capable of making international law.

The Palestinian draft resolution would have condemned Israel for not co-operating with the fact-finding mission. It would also have endorsed Goldstone's call for the UN General Assembly or Security Council to follow up on the investigations into alleged violations.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu had threatened to suspend the peace process if the report were to advance out of the United Nations Human Rights Council (UNHRC).

The UNHRC meeting ended Thursday in Geneva without voting on the Palestinian-authored resolution. Its next gathering is in March.

The western nations want a resolution that describes the report on last winter's war in Gaza as flawed and delegates consideration of its findings of human rights abuses solely to independent Israeli bodies. U.S. officials indicated that they would not allow the report to reach the Security Council.

Israel refused to co-operate with the fact-finding mission, headed by Richard Goldstone, a former South African judge. The Israeli government said UNHRC, which commissioned the report, has an implacable anti-Israel basis, and noted that the fact-finding mission's mandate drew pre-emptive conclusions, accusing Israel of "violating" laws.

Israel said the commission's mandate undermined whatever report might emerge. It accused Goldstone, in the final report, of ignoring Hamas' agenda to wipe out Israel, of not sufficiently addressing the difficulties of combat in built-up areas and of drawing far-reaching conclusions not based on fact.

Following the decision, the PA came under fire from Hamas and Palestinian human rights groups who accused it of blocking the resolution after heeding pressure from the United States and Israel.

The Palestinian Authority denies that was the reason behind the decision.

Last Warsaw Ghetto uprising commander dies

JTA

WARSAW — Tributes poured in following the death of Marek Edelman, the last surviving commander of the 1943 Warsaw Ghetto uprising against the Nazis.

Edelman died Friday in Warsaw at the age of 90.

"He will remain in my memory as a fighting hero, a man of great courage," said Shevach Weiss, former Israeli ambassador to Poland and former head of the Knesset. "He never ceased in his struggle for human freedom and for Poland's freedom."

A cardiologist who after World War II lived and worked in the central city of Lodz, Edelman joined the anti-Communist Solidarity movement in 1980 and later fought for other civic and human rights causes, becoming a moral authority in Poland. After the fall of communism, he was awarded Poland's highest civilian honour, the Order of the White Eagle. He also was awarded the French Legion of Honor and an honorary degree from Yale.

Marek Edelman

Lech Walesa, the former Solidarity leader who became Polish president after the fall of communism, called Edelman "an upright, unequalled human being. There are no words to express the loss."

Said French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner: "France has lost a hero. He was a man who thought and did the unthinkable."

The United States stands with Poland as it mourns the loss of a great man," U.S. State Department spokesperson Ian Kelly said Saturday. "We extend our sincerest condolences to the family and friends of Mr. Edelman and salute his life dedicated to the defence of human dignity and freedom."

Edelman's funeral was held Friday at Warsaw's main Jewish cemetery.

Some 40,000 secular Israelis pray together on Yom Kippur

By JENNY HAZAN
CJN Israel Bureau

The first time Rabbi Yair Silverman held Yom Kippur services for secular Israelis in a school gymnasium in Zichron Ya'acov, only six families attended. This year, just two years later, some 1,500 participants turned up.

"Last year we had well over 1,000, and this year, many more," says Rabbi Silverman, 35, an Orthodox rabbi from Montreal, who made aliyah three years ago.

"These are people who either have never gone to synagogue in the past or who last went as children," Rabbi Silverman says. "Many discover for the first time, or rediscover, powerful feelings of forgiveness and renewal that can come along with experiencing Yom Kippur communally, and it is very moving for them."

Rabbi Silverman is one of 200 rabbis who volunteered to hold explanatory Yom Kippur services across Israel for more than 40,000 secular participants this year, as part of an initiative called Praying Together.

The program, run by Tzohar: A Window Between Worlds, a non-profit organization dedicated to bridging the gap between secular and religious people in Israel, has grown by 10 to 15 per cent each year since it started in 10 years ago.

"The reality in Israel is that although some two-thirds of Israelis respect the sanctity of Yom Kippur and acknowledge it in one form or another, most stay at home," says Tzohar co-founder and chair Rabbi David Stav.

Rabbi Stav believes the lack of comfort with Orthodox services can be attributed to several factors, including crowdedness of synagogues during the High Holidays, which makes non-regulars fearful of taking regulars' seats; a non-welcoming atmosphere; alienation from the service itself, in which many non-observant find themselves lost in the prayer book; and hostility on the part of seculars toward the religious establishment, which they feel they would somehow be submitting to, by attending Orthodox synagogue services.

Tzohar services attempt to respond to these issues. They are held in cultural and community centres rather than synagogues, neutral places where attendees don't feel like strangers or guests; rabbis stop frequently during services to offer explanations and reference page numbers; and Tzohar prints special kippot, a "machzor Yom Kippur," and detailed handouts explaining the rituals, meanings of the prayers and prayer processes (when to stand, when to bow).

"For tens of thousands of Jews in Israel, Yom Kippur is their only contact with Judaism for the year," says Nachman Rosenberg, executive vice-president of Tzohar. "It should be a warm, welcoming and meaningful spiritual experience."

Rosenberg says that unlike many other non-profit organizations that aim to inspire secular Jews to become more observant, Tzohar is not a "stairway" to greater religious observance, and is concerned exclusively with offering secular Jews a connection to Jewish tradition at their level of comfort.

"We are not interested in encouraging secular Jews to become religious. We are interested in offering a spiritual window to the 80 per cent of secular Jews who will remain secular, but who want to have some connection to Judaism," he says. "In Israel, being religious tends to be a zero sum game, and this is unfortunate, given that there are a lot of Jews looking for ways to embrace their tradition on their own terms."

In some cases, however, the Yom Kippur services have led to the creation of new Judaism-centred communities. For instance, Rabbi Silverman's High Holiday services have served as a springboard for the birth of a new community in Zichron Ya'acov, focused around weekly Shabbat services, which attract about 80 families, and Torah classes, which attract many more.

"We wanted to create a community that would be welcoming, respect people where they are at, and help them become the people they want to be, in a way that they find intuitively meaningful," says Silverman.

"There is something tremendously ironic about the fact that secular Jews are alienated from 'Jewish community' in Israel, but they are. Jewish community is largely Orthodox and synagogue-centred here. At the same time, there is a real thirst among secular Jews for spirituality. There is an overarching trend in Israel to seek meaning in one's life, which has blossomed over the last decade."

At the heart of this "blossoming" is Tzohar, which was established in 1996 in response to increasing polarization between religious and secular populations in Israel – specifically when it came to marriage.

For most secular Israelis, their first brush with the national religious authority, the rabbinate, is when they get married, and many are turned off by the bureaucratic organization and its process. In lieu of the option to be married in a civil ceremony in Israel, many secular Israelis opt to wed in neighboring countries such as Cypress, since Israel recognizes civil marriages performed outside of the country.

Tzohar offered these couples a viable alternative, making available secular-friendly Orthodox services recognized by the rabbinate, free of charge. In addition, Tzohar's volunteer rabbis adhere to a strict policy of booking only one wedding per day (as opposed to rabbis provided by the rabbinate, who are paid per ceremony and are more likely to overbook). Tzohar also offers pre-wedding ceremony consulting services.

Since the organization started to perform weddings 13 years ago, more than 30,000 couples have been married through Tzohar, with 2,500 to 3,000 requesting services each year.

"We managed to transform the Orthodox wedding in Israel into a phenomenal success," Rosenberg says.

Today, the organization, with more than 1,000 rabbis, educators and volunteers, does much more to bridge the gap between secular and religious Israelis. In addition to performing marriages and running the Praying Together Yom Kippur program, Tzohar offers alternative rabbinate-mandatory premarital counselling to more than 2,500 brides each year, assistance with halachic Jewish authentication to thousands of families from the former Soviet Union, training and placement of Orthodox rabbis in 15 secular communities via the organization's communities program (among them Rabbi Yair Silverman of Zichron Ya'acov), as well as public activism and Jewish educational leadership conferences and publications that promote Jewish identity and unity in Israel.

"We believe there is a deep thirst for spiritualism and connection to Judaism among the people of Israel that is not being met by the religious establishment," Rabbi Stav says. "It's a pity that because of his attitude toward the religious establishment, the secular Jew will lose his ties to Judaism. That's where we come in. We try to show secular Israeli society that Judaism and Jewish tradition are relevant to them."

"There are many challenges facing Israel today," Rosenberg adds. "This one – dwindling Jewish identity and the united Zionist spirit – is something that, unlike Iran, we can do something about. We have succeeded and can succeed in promoting the Jewish identity of the State of Israel."

Tunnels destroyed

The Israeli Air Force targeted five smuggling tunnels last week in the Rafah border area in the southern Gaza Strip. The attack was carried out in response to reported Qassam rockets and a mortar shell fired into Israeli territory from the Gaza earlier in the week and during Yom Kippur. Since the beginning of 2009, some 725 Qassam rockets, mortar shells and Grad missiles have been fired at Israel.

German subs arrive

Two new German submarines were delivered to Israel. The submarines, ordered in 2005, reportedly can launch cruise missiles carrying nuclear warheads, according to the French news agency AFP. An Israeli military spokesperson, speaking off the record, confirmed the delivery of the two Dolphin-class submarines, known as U212s. The range of the missiles the subs can carry would extend at least as far as Iran. Israel reportedly now has five submarines from Germany, which donated the first two subs to Israel after the 1991 Gulf War. The two countries split the cost of the third sub. In a recent military exercise, an Israeli submarine entered the Suez Canal for the first time, accompanied by an Egyptian naval escort.

Riot in eastern Jerusalem

Palestinians rioted in eastern Jerusalem over Yom Kippur, throwing rocks and firebombs as well as garbage at police in the eastern Jerusalem neighbourhood of Isawiya. In addition, at least two firebombs were hurled at Jewish homes in Silwan. In response, Jews stoned Arab cars. The unrest followed an incident on Sept. 27 when at least 150 Palestinians surrounded and threw stones at 15 Jews visiting the Temple Mount. Israeli police fired stun grenades and tear gas at the attackers during the incident, which occurred on the eve of Yom Kippur. The Palestinians reportedly began the riot on the Temple Mount because they heard that it was being invaded by Jewish "settlers."

New Technion head

Renowned sleep medicine expert Peretz Lavie became president of Haifa's Technion-Israel Institute of Technology. Lavie succeeds Yitzhak Apeloig. "We need to re-educate the Israeli public and our government about the value of higher education, and clearly show that Israel's future is tied to world-class education in science and technology," Lavie said. Lavie joined the Technion in 1975 as a lecturer, and in 1979 developed the Technion Sleep Research Laboratory and Sleep Medicine Center, playing a major role in the development of sleep medicine that is now the subject of study for thousands of scientists around the world. The centre has branches throughout Israel and also is a part of the Harvard School of Medicine. The editor-in-chief of the Journal of Sleep Research, a leading publication in the field, Lavie has authored several influential books, including The Enchanted World of Sleep. The best-seller has been translated into 15 languages.

Tabernacle tourists

About 8,000 Christian tourists from about 100 countries around the world, will participate in the Christian Feast of Tabernacle this week. The festival, which this year carries the slogan "The Tabernacle of David," is sponsored by the International Christian Embassy Jerusalem and the Ministry of Tourism. Participants come from tens of countries including Australia, Bolivia, Canada, Chile, Austria, India, Italy, Nigeria, Brazil, Finland, Norway and more. The participants join in a traditional and colourful march through the streets of Jerusalem.

Gaydamak indicted

Russian-Israeli billionaire, Arcady Gaydamak, was indicted in Tel Aviv on charges of fraud and money laundering. Several top executives of a subsidiary of Bank Hapoalim were also indicted. They are accused of "the utilizing of the Israeli banking system for the purpose of defraudment and money laundering." Gaydamak, the owner of the Betar Jerusalem soccer team, is currently in Russia. He left a nearly $1-million bond to ensure his return to Israel, Ha'aretz reported.

Lots of laughs in Anvil! The Story of Anvil

Steve (Lips) Kudlow and Robb Reiner, on drums, playing at the Monsters of Transylvania Rockfest.

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

Who knew that Anvil, one of the pioneers of '80s heavy metal music, was formed by a couple of nice – well, by a couple of Jewish boys from Toronto?

Founded in 1981 by Steve (Lips) Kudlow and Robb Reiner, Anvil, who achieved worldwide notoriety with the song Metal on Metal, is the subject of the documentary Anvil! The Story of Anvil, directed by their former roadie, Sacha Gervasi. The film, which was critically acclaimed, is now available on DVD.

The film is quite possibly the greatest rock documentary since This Is Spinal Tap. And maybe, even funnier. It has its own Rob(b) Reiner and, if you look closely, an amplifier that goes to 11.

Anvil influenced some of the biggest names in heavy metal, including Metallica and Slayer, but while those groups rose to international stardom, Anvil faded into obscurity after a handful of albums.

Anvil! follows Kudlow and Reiner as Anvil embarks on a 2006 tour of Europe, led by a road manager who seems to be out of her depth. They leave their day jobs – Kudlow works for a caterer delivering food to schools – and look forward to the tour, hoping they catch the eye of a major promoter or record label.

After a successful start at a festival in Scandinavia, where Kudlow is like a kid in a candy store chasing after his rock idols, including rock drummer Tommy Aldridge and guitarist Michael Schenker, things go downhill when the band misses their train to their next gig.

In one tiny Czech club, Kudlow is restrained from beating up the club owner who refuses to pay them as they arrived late (their bus got lost), and at the Monsters of Transylvania Rockfest in Romania, the band plays to 174 people in an arena meant to seat 10,000.

The London Times called this "the greatest movie ever made about rock 'n' roll." You don't have to be an Anvil fan to enjoy it. It's a funny, and at times sad, and other times a really pathetic look at a couple of men in their 50s with families still trying to make it big in the world of rock 'n' roll. And it has a happy ending.

The documentary did bring the band back into the spotlight. They recently opened up for AC/DC, and the album they recorded during film, This Is Thirteen, was just released by VH1 Classic Records. As well, Kudlow and Reiner have written a book that's also titled The Story of Anvil.

The DVD special includes deleted scenes from the film, a commentary track with Gervasi, Kudlow and Reiner, and an interview with Metallica drummer Lars Ulrich, who tries to offer some insight into Anvil. This is a treat for any rock 'n' roll fan.

Coens' A Serious Man suffused with Jewishness

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Joel and Ethan Coen's A Serious Man is their most personal feature film to date. Premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival, and scheduled to open here on Oct. 16, it unfolds in the U.S. Midwest in 1967 and turns on a Jewish physics professor whose life implodes in a matter of weeks.

There are parallels here with the Coens' biography that are striking. They were born in a suburb of Minneapolis, raised in a Jewish family, came of age in the late 1960s and are the sons of university professors.

Compared to some of their previous films, such as Raising Arizona, Miller's Crossing, Fargo and even Barton Fink, A Serious Man is suffused with a deep spirit of Jewishness.

The Gopniks, the family around which the 105-minute film revolves, are unabashedly Jewish. The central character, Larry Gopnik, consults three rabbis as his problems pile up. There are direct references to the Torah, the Kabbalah, "mixers" at Hillel, "goys" and anti-Semitism, and the soundtrack resounds to both Yiddish and Hebrew.

The Jewish tone is established in the first scene, which takes place in a shtetl in the old country, probably Russia, in the waning decades of the 19th century or in the early 20th century.

A rabbi, supposedly deceased, visits a couple conversing in Yiddish. They are bundled up in layers of clothes to ward off the cold of winter. Is the rabbi real or merely an apparition? He may be a dybbuk, come to enlighten the couple.

The film fast forwards to an infectious pop song, Somebody to Love, as performed by the Jefferson Airplane, and then segues to a Hebrew class and a doctors' examining room in America.

At this point, the Coens get down to real business as the camera pans on a cookie-cutter suburb devoid of trees.

Gopnik (Michael Stuhlbarg), a reticent professor, is jolted to learn that his wife, Judith (Sari Lennick), plans to leave him. She demands a get, a Jewish divorce. Her paramour, Sy Abelman (Fred Melamed), is an educated, well-spoken widower to whom she has gotten "very close."

Gopnik's reaction is one of resignation rather than indignation or rage. Stranger still, he accepts Abelman's soothing but outrageous suggestion that he and his unemployed brother, Arthur (Richard Kind), should move out of the family house and decamp in a local motel so that he and Judith can live together happily ever after as lovers.

Judith's bombshell is merely one of Gopnik's problems. An anonymous letter writer is trying to sabotage his chances for tenure, and a disgruntled student with a heavy Korean accent attempts to bribe him for a passing grade. The student's menacing father threatens Gopnik if he refuses to comply.

Gopnik, whose health takes a sudden turn for the worse, is also having trouble controlling his son, a slacker at school, and his daughter, a Jewish princess who's lifting money from his wallet to pay for a future nose job.

The Coen brothers direct these scenes with aplomb, managing to inject appropriate doses of sardonic humour into the proceedings.

Gopnik's travails prompt him to consult several rabbis, but they are of little or no use to him. Try as they might, they cannot tell him why a serious man like himself – a mensch, really – is so besieged and bewildered by troubles.

The film barrels along at a steady clip, never tripping up on its subplots, and it is authentic in terms of the picture it paints of a modern, secular middle-class Jewish family in the United States in the last third of the 20th century.

Terrifically atmospheric, it conveys authenticity by panning on such minor details as a book by Abba Eban, Israel's foreign minister at the time, and photographs of solemn rabbis.

But ultimately, it is the calibre of the acting that elevates A Serious Man into a satisfying experience.

Stuhlbarg, a virtual unknown, is a wonder as a befuddled man embroiled in a mounting crisis. Melamed is pitch perfect as a soft-spoken hypocrite and backstabber, while Lennick is just so right as a wife who is dumping her husband for no apparent reason.

As a portrait of an individual who cannot make sense of his unravelling life, A Serious Man is an accomplishment. Indeed, it is the Coens' finest film in years.

Michael Stuhlbarg plays the lead role in A Serious Man.

Artist continues to work despite blindness

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

A retrospective of blind artist Ron Satok's innovative artwork was presented over two evenings at Toronto's Canadian National Institute for the Blind (CNIB) recently.

Satok's slide presentations included his artwork from Toronto, Mexico, Japan, England and New York, created during two stages of his life: his 22 sighted years and 33 non-sighted years.

Satok, now 77, was already an established painter when he lost his sight in 1976 as a result of glaucoma. Remarkably, rather than giving up, he continued to paint despite this handicap.

"Great artists are the ones who march to their own drummer - it's a necessity to do so. In years gone by, nobody was setting a trend," Satok said to a group of family, friends and art enthusiasts recently at the CNIB.

Taking his own advice, Satok travelled to Mexico in the summer of 1959 looking for inspiration. "I went to a country that made me very emotional – watching women washing clothes on flat rocks and watching blind vendors selling brought out the emotion and passion in me," Satok said.

"I knew I was in the right place. I saw things that you don't see in Toronto or New York. That's what I needed. You can't always get passionate about something unless you're living it."

In Mexico, Satok went on a third-class bus and observed a young girl standing asleep beside her younger brothers, who were asleep on a bench.

"I thought to myself, 'How can she be that way without falling over when the bus lunges forward?' I was mesmerized. After watching her, I went home and from memory drew Children Asleep on a Bus. That's the way you learn, by doing it. Looking at the feet and at the shoulders is how you teach yourself how to draw, not from sketching or photography," he said.

Children Asleep on a Bus

Satok preferred using a pastel or a charcoal pencil and a limited amount of paint – that way he'd have more control and wouldn't have to wait for paint to dry.

After receiving a fellowship, the artist worked in Japan and England. In Tokyo, a Sumo theme became prominent in his work as he was fascinated with the gestures of Sumo wrestlers. "Wrestlers lifted up opponents and carried them across the ring, but they couldn't slash or punch," he said.

While in Japan, Satok discovered kumohada paper, a large-woven porous paper that inspired him to express himself in new ways. In London, he experimented by drawing with dark charcoal pencils that grazed the surface of the kumohada paper and gave it a tapestry-like quality seen in Conversations with Yoshiko, a seven-by-seven-foot charcoal, pastel and acrylic painting of abstract faces within a circle format.

Satok's work has been showcased in museums and public spaces all over the world. During his sighted years, Satok was commissioned to create works such as Face-off, a vibrant hockey mural whose central portion, Detail, is on exhibit in the VIP entranceway of BMO Field at Exhibition Place in Toronto.

In his non-sighted years, he was commissioned to do One Force of Destiny, a 14-by-16-foot mural consisting of three-quarters of a million tesserae (Italian glass mosaics), on display at the Joey and Toby Tanenbaum Opera Centre on Front Street. With the assistance of patients from the Donwood Institute, a drug and alcohol rehabilitation centre, and students of the Toronto Catholic District School Board, the mural was completed in eight months in 1988.

Satok attributes his love of the arts to his parents, who inspired him since he was a child. He studied visual arts at the Ontario College of Art.

After losing his eyesight, Satok founded the Satok School of the Arts, where he has taught children and adults who are blind or physically or developmentally challenged to discover their innermost emotions and transpose them into art.

Satok received an Order of Ontario Lifetime Achievement Award in 1994.

"When you have a calling, believe in the power of it and follow your dream," he said.

For more information about Satok and the Satok School of the Arts, call 416-967-0780.

BETH TZEDEC PRESENTS WINE EVENING WITH DISPLAY AND SILENT AUCTION OF JEWISH CEREMONIAL CUPS

A new exhibition of one-of-a-kind Jewish ritual cups for life cycle and holiday events, created by Canadian artists in silver, ceramic glass and other materials, is currently on view in the Beth Tzedec Reuben and Helene Dennis Museum, 1700 Bathurst St.

During a kosher wine tasting in the synagogue foyer on Sunday, Oct. 18, 7:30 p.m., participants may tour the museum's exhibit of ceremonial cups and bid on them at a silent auction. Admittance to the wine tasting is $36 per person. A wine expert from Mazel Wines will discuss new developments in kosher wines. Silent auction bids will continue until 8:30 p.m.

Guests are invited to meet the artists. All proceeds go toward museum programs and conservation of artefacts. To register for the wine tasting, contact Avital, 416-781-3511 or e-mail info@beth-tzedec.org. For the museum, please phone 416-781-3514, ext. 232.

Gertrude Berg is the subject of an engrossing documentary.

Focus on The Goldbergs: Television pioneer Gertrude Berg is the subject of Yoo Hoo Mrs. Goldberg, a new film by Aviva Kempner that opens in Toronto on Oct. 16. Berg was the creator, principal writer and star of The Goldbergs, a popular radio show that became television's first character-driven domestic sitcom, in 1949. The "humorous and eye-opening" documentary includes interviews with Supreme Court justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, actor Ed Asner, producers Norman Lear and Gary David Goldberg, and National Public Radio correspondent Susan Stamberg.

Kempner, maker of the previously acclaimed film The Life and Time of Hank Greenberg, hosts Q&A discussions at screenings at the Cineplex Odeon Sheppard Grande Cinemas on Oct. 17 and 18.

Jerusalem Docs: The upcoming Planet in Focus International Environmental Film Festival presents more than 85 environmentally themed films from 25 countries, including a Land & Conflict series, co-presented with the International Diaspora Festival, and Voices Forward, focusing on "people and land in contested terrain."

Jerusalem Moments 2009 is a program featuring multiple short documentaries by seven young Palestinian and Israeli directors that reflect the complexity of life in Jerusalem in the context of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The series was commissioned by Ir Amim (City of Nations), a non-profit and supposedly non-partisan organization that examines issues affecting Israeli-Palestinian relations and Jerusalem's political future. A post-screening discussion will include participating filmmakers. Innis College, University of Toronto. Sunday, Oct. 25, 3 to 5 p.m.

The festival is also screening Voices From El Sayed, a "beautiful and layered documentary" by Israeli director Oded Adomi Leshem. The film focuses on a largely deaf Bedouin community, as one of its own prepares for a cochlear implant. Producer Itay Ken-Tor will be in attendance for a post-screening discussion. Royal Ontario Museum, Saturday, Oct. 24, 9:30 p.m.

Other Middle Eastern films are included in the festival, which runs Oct. 21 to 25. $10 per screening. 416-531-4689, www.planetinfocus.org.

Spies of Warsaw takes spy genre to sophisticated heights

By NORMAN RAVVIN

Alan Furst's suspense novels of eastern Europe have become the critics' choice among recent writers of espionage tales set in the shadow of Nazi and Soviet political power. His recent The Spies of Warsaw (Random House), set in 1937, takes the spy genre to sophisticated heights while depicting a setting which, in less than a decade, would be obliterated by the German army.

Norman Ravvin

Furst's hero is the self-effacing, though still-dashing, Jean-Francois Mercier, who is the military attaché at the French Embassy in Warsaw. A hero of World War I, Mercier is well schooled in the falsities and fiascoes of international diplomacy, and he has little regard for his own country's military preparedness in the event of another massive German assault on France.

Part of the suspense that drives The Spies of Warsaw derives from Mercier's premonition of coming dangers, "a certain apprehension, a shadow of war." And he is motivated by this apprehension to plan a number of undercover excursions over the German border, where getting caught would not necessarily mean death, but would, at least, end his career. Through his discoveries, Mercier builds a reliable argument for the kind of war the Germans are planning – its differences from the trench warfare of World War I, including the increased reliance on tanks to plow through stretches of forest, making the French Maginot Line a useless defence.

The Spies of Warsaw presents Mercier as being free of the preconceived notions of prewar Europe. He is at odds with his own military commanders, with the appeasement of the English, and the isolationism and self-interest of such countries as Canada and the United States.

On one of Mercier's spy missions into German territory, he encounters the grotesque quality of German anti-Jewish propaganda as he and his driver pass through "pretty Schwabisch villages. Every one of them had its Christbaum, a tall evergreen in the centre of town, with candles lit as darkness fell, and a star on top. There were also candles in every window, and red-berried holly wreaths hung on the doors. By the side of the road, at the entry to each village, stood a sign attacking the Jews. This was, Mercier thought, a kind of competition, for none of the signs were the same. Juden dirfen nicht bleiben – 'Jews must not stay here' – was followed by "Wer die Juden unterstuzt fordert den Kommunissmus, 'Who helps the Jews helps communism…'"

Mercier is not a Judeophile and needn't speechify about the madness of Nazism for readers to appreciate his ethical view of prewar anti-Semitism. He is an inheritor of the tradition of existential heroes found in the fiction of Raymond Chandler, Dashiell Hammett and Ernest Hemingway. Furst's notable additions to the genre include Mercier's successful romance with a Polish woman he meets in the course of his work, and his deep feelings for Warsaw, its cultural effervescence and variety.

In a few striking set pieces, Furst brings to life the coffee-house culture of Praga, across the Vistula River from Warsaw's main centre, the nightlife and country houses of the city's elite, and the Jewish quarter, Muranow, where Nalewki Street offers up "kosher butchers, pushcarts piled with old clothes or pots and pans, men in caftans and fur hats, hurrying along through the snow."

These atmospheric qualities and the book's rootedness in its particular time and place make it a more satisfying read than its counterparts by lesser spy writers, and even more satisfying than the hard-boiled work of Chandler and Hemingway, in which the hero's moral code is tested through his interaction with an empty and cynical surrounding culture. Mercier feels deeply for Warsaw, which he fears is doomed. It is this quality that makes The Spies of Warsaw more than just a narrative of suspense, but one of deep commitment to the lost causes of recent European history.

The Jazzman hits high, low notes

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Last year, Josh Koffman set out to direct a movie in homage of his legendary grandfather: the jazz saxophonist, flutist and composer Moe Koffman.

That movie, titled The Jazzman, is now out.

Koffman also co-produced and wrote the film, his first feature-length endeavour, made in collaboration with the local production company Summer Pictures. He has crafted a loving take on Moe's music and his legacy on the Canadian jazz scene.

Moe Koffman died in 2001 of non-Hodgkin's lymphoma at 73.

Jazz fans will find listening to the film's soundtrack a treat. It features a plethora of Moe's compositions. Koffman uses the music to maximum effect, giving his grandfather a presence in the film that the audience can feel.

Though set in contemporary times, the movie alludes to an earlier epoch, when jazz could be heard in many a Toronto bar.

Torontonian viewers will note the heavy use of various city landmarks and buildings, as Koffman shot the film on location in his hometown.

He's assembled a strong cast, starting most notably with veteran character actor Michael Ironside, who plays Bernie Kadly, an aging sax player battling both the ravaging effects of lung cancer and a headstrong son.

Corey Sevier plays John Kadly, Bernie's son, an aspiring jazz drummer with a rebellious streak who won't listen to his father's warnings about the perils of the music industry.

Actress Laura Vandervoort provides the love interest. She plays Sara, a special needs educator drawn into John's tormented world after she falls for him one night at a bar.

Sevier, Vandervoort and Ironside all hail from Ontario.

Ironside lends a nice veteran presence to the film, bringing an authenticity to his character – channelling Moe, as it were – that helps balance the sometimes stilted group effort of his co-actors in the early scenes.

Vandervoort and Sevier's characters progressively warm to each other, and to the viewer, as the film moves from its first to middle act.

While filming at The Beach in Toronto last year, Koffman told The CJN he hoped the movie would depict the "struggle of the artist as a timeless theme" and show the Toronto jazz scene in a way that "has never been shown before. To really showcase the jazz scene at its best, before it becomes totally forgotten."

Filmmaker Josh Koffman

The Jazzman does that while wrapping a dramatic arc around the scene. This is accomplished primarily through John and Bernie's father-son struggle to connect despite their stubbornness.

Koffman also pulls no punches with the gradual demise and eventual death of Bernie. Suffice it to say, the latter is not a scene meant for kids or people who have lost loved ones to lung cancer. Those viewers may wish to avert their eyes, lest they relive some painful memories.

That said, the scene is probably one of the movie's best. It infuses the closing minutes with deeper meaning and forces the audience to reflect on the important things in life; family, health, happiness and, in this case, jazz.

The Jazzman premières on SuperChannel on Oct. 25 at 8 p.m.

Sascha Cole has three roles in Stoppard's Rock 'n' Roll

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Sascha Cole is thrilled to be playing three characters alongside veteran actors Kenneth Welsh and Fiona Reid in the Canadian Stage Company's production of Tom Stoppard's play Rock 'n' Roll.

"I feel so lucky and so thankful. I just try to be a sponge in the best way possible, trying to learn as much as I can from them by watching them work. They are amazing onstage together, and I feel really blessed to be part of the show," Cole, 25, says.

Rock 'n' Roll, in Toronto at the Bluma Appel Theatre until Oct. 24, was a hit on Broadway and in London's West End. It begins just after the Soviet invasion of Czechoslovakia in 1968.

Jan, played by Shaun Smyth, is a Jewish rock music enthusiast and student at Cambridge University in England. He returns to his Czech homeland, where rock music is censored by the Communist government. While there, he takes up the cause of a local band called the Plastic People of the Universe, which lands him in prison.

Cole plays Gillian, a student of classical literature at Cambridge University; Magda, a law student in Prague and the girlfriend of Jan, and her third character, Deirdre, is a student in the 1990s.

"I have three supporting roles throughout the play, and I get to come in at each time period. It is really amazing and challenging to work on this Tom Stoppard play in a way that I have [not] ever been challenged before as an actress," Cole says. "His writing is extremely intellectual.

"As a company, we spent the first four days of rehearsal just talking about the ideas in the play and researching as much as possible, so that we could completely understand what these characters are talking about and where they're coming from. I wasn't alive when these events were happening, I have just heard about it in passing from my parents… now, I've had the opportunity to really understand what was happening in the '60s – rock 'n' roll, communism, Prague Spring, prior to the invasion and the Czechoslovakian invasion."

A graduate of the National Theatre School in Montreal, Cole, now living in Toronto, also studied at the British American Drama Academy in Oxford, England, last summer.

Her stage credits include TeAmim Theatre's Ten Green Bottles, Whale Music, The Tin Drum: Book One, A Flea in Her Ear and Twelfth Night. On television, Cole appeared in the CBC production The Great War, and in Manson, which was aired on the History Channel.

Cole's family has a long tradition in the local arts scene. Her aunt, Susan Cole, is the entertainment editor of NOW magazine. Another aunt, Ellen Cole, is the executive director of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. Before going to school in England, Cole worked as the receptionist at the JCC for three years.

"Theatre for me is really fun, but when I'm not doing that I read a lot of fiction," Cole says. "I just went travelling by myself for the first time to London and Paris, and now I have the travel bug."

For tickets to Rock 'n' Roll at the Bluma Appel Theatre, call 416-368-3110 or Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111. The production moves to Edmonton for a Nov. 7 to 29 run at the Citadel Theatre. 780-425-1820.

College coach has eyes set on March Madness

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

John Shulman understands there's no such thing as rebuilding at the University of Tennessee at Chattanooga (UTC).

Despite having graduated the entire starting lineup from last season's Southern Conference championship team, the Mocs' basketball coach is determined to mould a unit over the coming months that will compete for another NCAA tournament berth.

They got an early start on the season coming north of the border for four exhibition games, a trip American schools are allowed to make once every four years. UTC was last in Canada in 2004, when the Mocs played at Ottawa and Carleton.

"The reason we wanted to do this was to get invaluable experience," said Shulman, an East Tennessee State alumnus entering his sixth season as bench boss. "It's so important for us to do this. I'm not sure I love our basketball team at this moment, but we'll get there."

Playing against the University of Toronto less than 12 hours after arriving in the country, UTC dropped an 85-70 decision. The Mocs were back on the court six hours later and held on to defeat York 78-71 after leading comfortably for most of the game.

The team toured the CN Tower and took in the Blue Jays-Yankees game the next day prior to losing at Guelph that evening. Chattanooga defeated Sheridan College before flying home with a split of the four games.

The Mocs started working out on Aug. 24 in preparation for those games. NCAA regulations restrict team practices before Oct. 16, but players can work out individually for two hours a week.

Chattanooga opens its season at home on Nov. 13 against Virginia Intermont.

This year's schedule is considerably easier than last season's, when the team opened against Tennessee, Missouri, Memphis and USC. Three of those teams were ranked in the U.S. top 20 at the time.

The first four games this year are against NAIA-school Virginia-Intermont, followed by East Tennessee State, Richmond and Missouri.

John Shulman

Shulman hopes to have his team set by the middle of December, when the Mocs play host to Georgia Tech.

Last year's team started 2-9, but peaked at the right time of the year en route to the school's 10th NCAA tournament appearance. Playing host to its conference tournament provided the Mocs with a home-court advantage that it rode to Philadelphia and March Madness.

"We didn't deserve a 16 seed, but our record [18-16 entering the tournament] indicated that we did," said Shulman, whose team was trounced 103-47 by top-seeded Connecticut in the opening round. "We kind of got what we deserved. We didn't take care of business our last three games in the regular-season and that's why we got a 16."

It was Shulman's second trip to the tournament in his five years at the school. In 2005, Chattanooga was much more competitive, leading Wake Forest by three at the half before falling 70-54, in the first round.

The Mocs received a lot of publicity in the week leading up to the game against Connecticut, when late-night talk show host Jimmy Fallon adopted the school as his team for the tournament. Shulman was interviewed on the show via Skype the day before they met UConn, and flew to New York with his seniors to appear on the show the night after.

Chattanooga has won the Southern Conference North Division title three times since Shulman achieved his dream of becoming a Division I basketball coach at age 37 back in April 2004.

In his first season, he guided the Mocs to the division title, the conference championship and a 69-68 victory at Tennessee, the school's first victory over the Volunteers since 1927.

Israeli fencer advances at championships in Turkey

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israeli fencer Tomer Or advanced to the third round of the World Fencing Championships in Antalya, Turkey, last week after his Iranian opponent, Mohammed Hussein Ibrahimi, failed to report for the match.

Or, 31, returned to competition in May after a drug test earlier this year turned up traces of marijuana. All of Israel's competitors advanced last week: Or, Maor Hatuel, Kobi Hatuel and Oren Basal.

The nine-day championship ends Oct. 8 with final matches.

Boxer to fight in championship bout

JTA

NEW YORK — An Israeli boxer reportedly will fight for a world championship for the first time.

Yuri Foreman, who is undefeated in 27 professional bouts, will challenge super welterweight champion Daniel Santos (32-3-1) for the World Boxing Association title, the 15 Rounds website reported last week.

Dovid Efune, Foreman's spokesperson, said the fight is expected to take place Nov. 14 in Las Vegas.

"He's got a Jewish head attached to his Jewish fist," Efune said in a telephone interview. "He's a very tactical player. He boxes like he's playing chess."

Foreman, 29, is observant and is studying to become an Orthodox rabbi.

He was born in the city of Gomel in present-day Belarus, then part of the Soviet Union, and moved to Israel at age nine. Foreman relocated to Brooklyn, N.Y., in 2001 to pursue his boxing career.

Donors can help save lives

Compiled by CJN Staff

Canadian Blood Services is asking potential donors to attend a clinic on Oct. 20, 3:30 to 8 p.m., at the offices of National Council of Jewish Women, Toronto section (NCJW), 4700 Bathurst St., south of Finch Avenue West.

A press release from Canadian Blood Services said the blood donor clinic and one-match screening could save the life of Shari Ichelson Silverman, 34, who has Acute Myeloid Leukemia.

When Silverman, mother of 11-year-old daughter Ashley-Ann, first fell ill in June, numerous doctors made wrong diagnoses, the press release said, and when she collapsed and was transported by ambulance to hospital, staff thought she was dehydrated.

Blood tests soon revealed, however, that Silverman had leukemia, and testing at Princess Margaret Hospital led to the definitive diagnosis.

She spent six weeks in hospital undergoing chemotherapy and was so ill that the Code Blue (medical emergency) team responded to her twice. She received a second round of chemotherapy as an outpatient, but she developed a high fever and was hospitalized again.

Now, the press release said, Silverman has been given the news that she must have a bone marrow transplant in order to survive.

Shari Ichelson Silverman and her daughter Ashley-Ann

"She has had numerous blood and platelet transfusions to keep her alive to this point, and she will need many more. She needs blood, platelets and a bone marrow donor to survive."

Her best chance of survival, it said, is a Human Leukocyte Antigen match from a Jewish donor. "All that is needed [now] is a simple mouth swab."

The clinic could help Silverman, or the 833 other patients currently in need of life saving bone marrow transplants, the release said.

A second clinic, a collaboration between NCJW Canada Toronto section and the Hospital for Sick Children (SickKids), is being held, also at Council House, Nov. 1, 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. to screen for Ashkenazi Jewish genetic diseases including Tay-Sachs, Canavan, Familial Dysautonomia, Bloom syndrome, Fanconi Anemia Type C, Niemann-Pick disease Type A and Mucolipidosis IV.

Sponsors of the genetic clinic also include Jacob's Ladder – the Canadian Foundation for Control of Neurodegenerative Disease, Dysautonomia Foundation of Canada, Fanconi Canada and the Stephanie Just Memorial Fund.

SAUTEED SPINACH WITH PINE NUTS & GOLDEN RAISINS

2 tsp extra-virgin olive oil
2 tblsp golden raisins
1 tbls pine nuts
2 cloves garlic, minced
1 10-oz bag fresh spinach tough stems removed
2 tsp balsamic vinegar
1/8 tsp salt
1 tblsp shaved Parmesan cheese
Freshly ground pepper, to taste

Heat oil in large nonstick skillet over medium-high heat. Add raisins, pine nuts and garlic; cook, stirring, until fragrant, about 30 sec. Add spinach and cook, stirring, until just wilted, about 2 min. Remove from heat; stir in vinegar and salt. Serve immediately, sprinkled with Parmesan and pepper.

Clanton Park: the champions

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

In September, on a cool night, my team, Clanton Park Synagogue, won the Orthodox Synagogue 2009 Baseball Championship.

I watched from the sidelines with pride, as my mom and I cracked open sunflower seeds. I had an injury. We clapped feverishly as Clanton Park shul dominated its opponents, Shomrai Shabbos, the best team in the regular season.

URBAN WRITER

Clanton Park team is made up of many buddies, fine athletes and talmudic-thinking ball players. Here are a few things the boys had to say.

Ezra Rosenzweig, a tenacious outfielder, said, "I've been on the team for eight years. We are unique because we are like one big family." He added, "When you have [Elie] Goldberg and [Oren] Gal hitting bombs, it makes it a little easier to win."

Ezra said his greatest play of the year came in the first round of the playoffs. Clanton Park was winning 7-5, with bases loaded and two outs. He was playing centre field, and the ball was hit over the right fielder's head. Ezra darted from right field and nabbed the ball. "I'm pretty sure it was quite a lift for the team!"

Immanuel Greenberg, the team captain, a warrior, said he has known most of his teammates "since we learned how to throw a ball." His most memorable game was when he and Ezra hit eight home runs in one game – four each."

Immanuel said, "From managing, I've learned this is no one-man show and the heart of this team is the respect, friendship and the determination to win."

Oren Gal, a first-class athlete, reminisced about a line drive he hit into the far trees in left centre in Clanton Park, "which began its decline as it was stopped by the trees."

Oren attributes Clanton Park's success to the fact that "no one is bigger than the team." He said, "This is displayed by always hitting the cut-off man, and not running ourselves out of innings. He added, "Clanton Park is not a charity. They do not just give away games!"

Baruch Kanner, a six-year veteran, has known these guys all his life. He said the players are committed to the good of the team, "hence winning the championship frequently over the years."

Eli Edell, like Baruch, grew up with the boys. He fondly remembers when the bases were loaded in the final game and he hit a blast of a triple in the top of the ninth to secure a come-from-behind victory.

Moshe Hillel Lipson, the youngest team member said, "As a boy I looked up to the guys." He said his greatest hit was a double to the opposite field in the final game, and managing two extra bases.

"The team plays with a drive to win every time we step up to the plate," he added.

Elie Goldberg, a slugger, stated that the most powerful moment was lifting the shul trophy in Stanley Cup style. "The strength of this team is we're solid at every position, every guy is willing to bat wherever in the lineup, and we have really cool jerseys."

Yizchak Kaplan, a focused pitcher, rejoiced over striking out one of Shomrai Shabbos' most powerful hitters to win the championship. He said, "This team has grown so much and continues to get stronger. Hopefully, we will continue together for many years to come."

In 5770, the respect found within this team should be extended to all Jews, from one denomination to another. Chag Samayach.

Dedicated to: Eli Edell, Oren Gal, Elie Goldberg, Immanuel Greenberg, Yitzchak Kaplan, Baruch Kanner, Ari Levy, Moshe Hillel Lipson, Daniel Magder and Ezra Rosenzweig.

PRIME MINISTER PREMIER MINISTRE

Holocaust Education Week
November 1-11, 2009

I am deeply honoured to extend my heartfelt greetings to all those participating in the 29th annual Holocaust Education Week.

Six decades have passed, but the painful lessons of the Holocaust continue to affect survivors, families and all the compassionate people who confront the horrors of this dark period for mankind. The systematic persecution and annihilation of millions of European Jews and other victims must never be forgotten. Vigilance, remembrance and education are essential to honour the memory of the victims and survivors of the Shoah.

We must resist viewing the Holocaust as a strictly historical event. The seeds of hatred that spawned this brutality are still germinating in parts of the world. Free and democratic societies such as Canada have a moral obligation to unequivocally condemn ideologies of hatred, anti-Semitism and tyranny whenever and wherever they occur. To this end, earlier this year Canada was proud to achieve full membership in the Task Force for International Cooperation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research. Together with twenty-seven member nations, we have pledged a commitment to teach future generations the lessons of the Holocaust.

I would like to commend all those involved in Holocaust Education Week, the UJA Federation Holocaust Centre of Toronto, as well as this week's guest speakers, for their crucial role in ensuring young Canadians learn the important lessons of the past.

On behalf of the Government of Canada, please accept my best wishes for a thought-provoking and enlightening week.

Sincerely,

The Rt. Hon. Stephen Harper, P.C., M.P.
Prime Minister of Canada

Premier of Ontario / Premier ministre de l'Ontario

November 1 – 11, 2009

A Personal Message from the Premier

On behalf of the Government of Ontario, I wish to extend greetings to everyone participating in the 29th annual Holocaust Education Week, organized by the Holocaust Centre of Toronto, UJA Federation.

Holocaust Education Week provides Ontarians with an opportunity to reflect on one of the darkest moments in human history and the lessons we can continue to learn from it. The thought-provoking educational and cultural activities planned this year not only pay tribute to those who so tragically perished in the Holocaust and honour those who survived it, but they also impel us to renew our resolve to ensure that such a tragedy never happens again.

The Holocaust serves as an enduring reminder of our obligation — as a society and as individuals — to be vigilant against all forms of hatred and intolerance, and to embrace inclusiveness and diversity. I commend everyone taking part in Holocaust Education Week for your commitment to a caring and compassionate society, one in which we protect the rights and dignity of every citizen.

I would like to thank all the hard-working organizers and volunteers who have devoted so much time and energy to making this year's Holocaust Education Week possible.

Please accept my best wishes.

Dalton McGuinty
Premier

Proclamation

Holocaust Education Week

November 1 – 11th, 2009

WHEREAS it is very important that we honour the memory of the men, women and children who perished in the Holocaust and recognize those who survived this tragedy.

In order to avoid a repetition of this dark time in history, it is our duty to continue to educate our children about the lessons of the past and instill in them a deeper understanding of their responsibility for the future.

It is only through education, understanding and remembrance of the Holocaust that awareness can be heightened and racism and prejudice eliminated.

NOW THEREFORE I, Mayor David Miller on behalf of Toronto City Council, do hereby proclaim November 1 - 11, 2009 as "Holocaust Education Week", and join with the Holocaust Education Centre and our Jewish community in honouring the Holocaust survivors, War Veterans and Resistance Fighters. This week is a reminder of their struggles and sacrifices and we must strive as a city to eliminate all forms of discrimination in our communities and our lives.

MARCHING FOR PEACE IN JERUSALEM

Tens of thousands of people – Israelis and tourists, Jews and non-Jews – participated last week in the annual March for Jerusalem that takes place during the holiday of Sukkot. Christian tourists from around the world celebrating the Feast of Tabernacles joined with Israelis in a colourful procession through the streets of Jerusalem, demonstrating to the world their support for a unified city of peace.

Israeli scientist wins Nobel Prize in chemistry

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

REHOVOT, Israel — Israeli scientist Ada Yonath, a leading researcher in the structural biology field, has been awarded a Nobel Prize in chemistry.

Yonath shares the prize with Britain's Venkatraman Ramakrishnan and Thomas Steitz, an American, for studies of the structure and function of the ribosome.

Yonath has focused her research on the structure of the ribosome, a part of the cell that synthesizes protein and translates genetic code in the production of protein.

Yonath was the first Israeli biologist to work with NASA in sending research material to outer space. She co-operated with NASA on 12 missions. Her research contributed greatly to the development of more effective antibiotics, which can overcome the phenomenon of drug-resistant pathogens.

Yonath is the fourth woman to win the Nobel chemistry prize and the first since 1964, when Dorothy Crowfoot Hodgkin of Britain received the prize.

"I'm really, really happy," Yonath said. "I thought it was wonderful when the discovery came. It was a series of discoveries... We still don't know everything, but we progressed a lot."

Yonath is a professor and head researcher in the field of structural biology and biochemistry at the Weizmann Institute of Science in Rehovot.

The News in Brief

Canada

New Cash For Chabad

VANCOUVER — Chabad of B.C. has been given $633,000 in federal stimulus cash. Ottawa gave Chabad the grant on Sept. 30, and the province of British Columbia provided a matching grant. Both hinge on Chabad's ability to raise $633,000 more. As of Oct. 3, it had raised $300,000, it said last week. The funds will help renovate and expand Chabad facilities, the group said. It received $600,000 in federal and provincial grants in Winnipeg last month to build a 17,000-square-foot centre in the south end of the Manitoba capital.

McGill Talk Disrupted

MONTREAL — Two protesters who disrupted an Oct. 5 anti-abortion lecture at McGill University titled "Echoes of the Holocaust" were fined for mischief. The McGill Tribune quotes one of the protesters, Elise Eisenkraft Klein, as saying, "As a human being, but also as a Jew, I would say that this kind of comparison is not acceptable. By this ridiculous claim of trying to 'humanize' fetuses in order to further their cause, they are dehumanizing Jews." Protesters drowned out Jose Ruba, co-founder of the Calgary-based Canadian Centre for Bio-Ethical Reform, by singing and went on stage to block graphic videos he tried to show. Police were called after protesters refused security requests to return to their seats and be quiet. They issued summary convictions for mischief to two protesters who stayed in the room after being told to sit down or leave. They were then escorted out. The McGill student group that organized Ruba's lecture said it would try to reschedule it.

Files Sent to France

OTTAWA — Files from a computer seized from the office of the wife of the man accused in a 1980 Paris synagogue bombing can be sent to French investigators, a judge ruled last week. Ontario Superior Court Justice Robert Maranger said the search and seizure of computers from the home and office of Rania Tfaily was "borderline," but her Charter rights weren't violated. France wants to have her common-law spouse, Hassan Diab, extradited to face charges in connection with the bombing, which killed four people and injured dozens more. Both computers belong to Carleton University, where Diab, a dual Lebanese and Canadian citizen, used to teach and Tfaily is a professor. The judge will rule this week on whether files from the second computer can be sent to France; the Ottawa Citizen reported Diab is fighting his extradition, saying he's a victim of mistaken identity.

World

Demjanjuk Trial Set

BERLIN — The war crimes trial of John Demjanjuk will begin Nov. 30 in Munich, the state court said. Demjanjuk, 89, is charged with being an accessory in the murder of 27,900 people in the Nazi death camp Sobibor. If convicted, he faces up to 15 years in jail. He denies the charges, saying he was a prisoner of war in a Nazi camp. In 2002, the U.S. Justice Department charged him with being a guard at Sobibor and revoked his citizenship for lying about his past to gain it. He was extradited to Germany in May. In the early 1980s, he was accused of being the guard "Ivan the Terrible" at Treblinka. He was deported to Israel in 1986 and sentenced to death in 1988. But Israel's Supreme Court overturned his conviction, saying there was doubt about his identity.

Redgrave Backs TIFF

NEW YORK — Actress Vanessa Redgrave defended the Toronto International Film Festival's decision to showcase films about Tel Aviv. In a letter to the New York Review of Books, written with artist Julian Schnabel and playwright Martin Sherman, she said the protest of the festival's decision to feature Tel Aviv in its City to City program was "improperly thought out" and has "distressing implications." Redgrave, a longtime supporter of the PLO, backed a British boycott of Israeli artists in the 1980s. The letter notes many films and plays criticizing Israel's treatment of the Palestinians are by artists who live in Tel Aviv. She also criticized protesters' use of the term "apartheid regime," stating "we oppose the current Israeli government, but it is a government. Freely elected. Not a regime. Words matter. The point... is not to grandstand but to inch toward a two-state solution."

Bill Would Stiffen Penalties For Hate

Marlene Jennings

OTTAWA — A bill that would make it a criminal offence to commit an act of mischief targeting non-religious property associated with an identifiable group was tabled in the House of Commons by Montreal-area Liberal MP Marlene Jennings on Oct. 1.

Bill C-451 would amend Section 430 of the Criminal Code to add the clause that mischief motivated by "bias, prejudice or hate based on religion, race, colour, national or ethnic origin, sex, language or sexual orientation" against schools, community centres or other buildings, or structures on that property, "used exclusively or principally" by one of those groups for educational, recreational, cultural purposes is an offence.

Convictions would carry a penalty of up to 10 years in jail for indictable (more serious) offences, and up to 18 months for summary convictions (more minor violations).

"The purpose of the bill is to take action against these crimes and to ensure that all Canadians are protected from such violence," Jennings said in the House of Commons.

Senior Bnei Mitzvah

CINCINNATI — Nine residents of a Cincinnati retirement home went to Israel to have their bnei mitzvah. The residents of the Cedar Village Jewish Retirement Community, along with two rabbis, 13 staff and a family member, are on a 10-day trip. The residents, whose average age is 86, were to have their bar and bat mitzvahs Oct. 15 in Jerusalem.

'Racism is stupid,' Wiesel tells 16,000 students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Holocaust survivor and Nobel laureate Elie Wiesel spoke in front of 16,000 students about the importance of tolerance and social action as part of We Day last week.

Wiesel joined a number of leading activists, politicians and entertainers – including former Canadian prime minister Paul Martin, author and environmentalist Robert Kennedy Jr., and pop stars Justin Bieber and the Jonas Brothers – at the Air Canada Centre on Oct. 5 for the Free The Children's annual We Day event.

We Day, which aims to empower youth to make positive change in the world, was conceived by brothers and Thornhill natives Craig and Marc Kielburger.

In 1995, Craig, now 26, a children's rights activist, founded Free the Children, an international non-profit organization that has since built more than 500 schools in developing countries.

The 16,000 grade 7-12 students from about 1,000 schools who attended the event were required to commit to a volunteer project through their school, or raise funds for Free The Children's Adopt a Village program, which aims to help communities break out of poverty.

Wiesel, who was introduced by Indigo Books and Music CEO Heather Reisman as "one of the great champions of the vulnerable" and a "champion of life," said that while Free the Children emphasizes freedom, "your freedom should never be at the expense of someone who has no freedom."

Eliciting cheers and even a standing ovation from the students, Wiesel, founder of the Elie Wiesel Foundation for Humanity, an organization that fights intolerance and injustice, said no one should ever accept racism.

"Racism is ugly, racism is stupid, racism is absurd," said the 81-year-old Boston University professor and author of more than 40 books of fiction and non-fiction, including the Holocaust work Night.

HONOURING LIVES LIVED

"Our wonderful life-affirming tradition turns loss into constructive remembrance that helps heal the world."

Shelley Norris, Executive Director, The Benjamin Foundation

The Benjamin Foundation allows families to entrust memorial donations for temporary management until they are ready to select a charity that meaningfully honours the deceased. This takes the pressure of making a long-term decision off grieving families and also makes it easy for mourners to contribute.

For Jerusalem's sake

From the editor's desk...

Incitement of the masses into irrational, frothing hordes ready at an instant to commit unimaginable harm to Jews has been a successful tactic of Arab demagogues throughout their nearly 100-year war against Jewish sovereign independence in the Middle East.

In the 1930s, Haj Amin Al Husseini, the mufti of Jerusalem, was fiendishly adept at fanning fires of hatred and violence against the Jews of the Yishuv (who were known by the rest of the world then as the Palestinians). When his outrages became too much even for the British Mandatory authorities, he fled to Berlin, where he happily became a confederate of the Nazis in executing their genocidal aspirations.

In the 1960s Egyptian leader Gamal Nasser incessantly inveighed on radio and television against "the Zionist entity," to the point where Arab populations throughout the Middle East essentially drooled with delight trawling the coastline of the Mediterranean into whose deathly depths Nasser had promised to throw all the Jews of Israel.

In the 1980s, while spurring on the bloody violence of the first intifadah, PLO leader Yasser Arafat lovingly referred to Palestinian children as his "precious stones," television and video cameras whirring heatedly alongside, as he launched them into battle against Israeli soldiers.

Incitement to hatred and violence has been the instrument of first choice of the religious, political and military leaders of Israel's enemies, including, alas, the leaders of all the various Palestinian movements.

Last week, predictably, as Jews and their friends from all over the world visited Jerusalem by the thousands to celebrate the autumn Jewish festivals, the pattern repeated. Jerusalem, once again, was the battleground. Jerusalem, once again, was the rallying cry.

On the eve of Yom Kippur, Sept. 27, some 150 Arabs stoned about a dozen Jews who had visited the Temple Mount. The Jews had permission from the Wakf, the Arab religious trust that rules the Temple Mount, to be there.

As in years past, a rumour circulated – malevolence obviously intended – that the Jews were coming to "occupy" the Temple Mount, that the Jews were coming to harm the holy mosques.

Riots ensued and spilled over, likely on instructions from highly placed Palestinian officials, to Arab neighbourhoods in the Old City. The clashes continued throughout Yom Kippur.

Israeli police temporarily restricted access to the Temple Mount to men over the age of 50 – on the premise that most of the violence is perpetrated by younger, more volatile men without family responsibilities and therefore with less to lose, so to speak – when they discovered wheelbarrows full of boulders and rocks stashed in various places across the Temple Mount. The caches were clearly deliberately set aside for use against Jews.

More violence erupted later in the week as Palestinian youths attacked worshippers on the Mount of Olives.

Sheikh Ra'ad Salah, the fiery, fundamentalist head of the northern branch of the Islamic Movement based near Nazareth, a worthy inheritor of the mufti's malicious mantle, called upon his supporters in east Jerusalem to "liberate al-Aqsa [a mosque on the Temple Mount] with blood and fire." He was arrested for inciting others to commit to violence, held in custody for less than a day, released and ordered not to set foot in Jerusalem for one month.

Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Salaam Fayad added to the atmosphere of insurrection. "We call on the Palestinian public to confront Israel and its plans," he said, implying that Israel had now formulated new plans for Jerusalem.

But, as he knows, the only plan Israel has for Jerusalem is the only plan it has ever had: that the city remain undivided. Indeed, his plan and the plan of the entire Palestinian leadership is to separate the Jews from the only city that has ever been a Jewish capital, to separate Jews from our history.

Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erekat, perhaps the most able dissembler among Palestinian spokesmen, said the Palestinian Authority condemned Israel for allowing Jews to visit the Temple Mount and called on the international community "to force Israel to halt its efforts to Jewify the city" (my emphasis).

Once again, Palestinian leaders are insidiously manipulating world opinion, even as they prey upon their own people, casting Israel as an interloper, a usurper, making the Jewish state defend its entitlement to be in Jerusalem.

As most of us recently chanted or read or skimmed the High Holiday prayers, we read time and time again of Jerusalem. Indeed, we ended the Yom Kippur fast with the millennial cry of communal and personal inspiration: "Next year in Jerusalem."

Jerusalem can no more be Judaized (or Jewified) than fresh air can be oxidized. Oxygen is part of the molecular definition of air. So, too, Judaism is part of the molecular definition of Jerusalem. It is inherent in the very essence and profound depth of Jerusalem.

To be sure, other religious and ethnic groups have also loved the city. But Jews have always agreed to "share" the city. Jews have always tried to build and beautify the city for the benefit of all its people, as the work of the Jerusalem Foundation, for example, proves so eloquently. And most importantly, Jews – and only Jews – have granted universal access to all worshippers of all faiths to their holy places in the city.

For the sake of Jerusalem, for the sake of our parents and our children, we must know how to answer the lies. And then we must answer them. –MBD

Consul general calls 'Brand Israel' a success

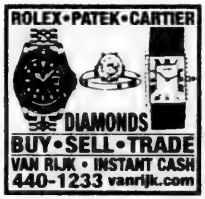
Time to 'make allies,' Gissin says

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Israel's pilot project in Toronto intended to help the Jewish state remake its image has concluded, and its chief organizer is calling it a success.

Brand Israel – the year-long initiative by the country's foreign ministry to portray Israel as a land of technological innovation, a producer of life-saving medicine, an archeological treasure chest and a top-notch tourist destination – was intended to move the popular discussion of Israel out from under the shadow of the Arab-Israeli conflict.

Israel's consul general to Toronto and Western Canada, Amir Gissin, helped spearhead the project, which often focused global attention on his office and saw a city-wide advertising blitz that included billboard, radio and TV promotions of Israel.



Gissin even donned fishing attire last summer to film a TV fishing show on the Bay of Quinte with iconic Canadian angler Italo Labignan.

Speaking to The CJN last week, Gissin said that, overall, he believes the project was a success, although a more empirical assessment of it is still being compiled by market researchers tasked with finding out how Canadians reacted to the campaign.

Yet he admitted he was unprepared for the degree to which anti-Israel activists latched onto the campaign and used it to try to cast the Jewish state in an even more negative light.

Amir Gissin

"When I sum up the challenges from this last year, I know one thing: we have to continue and make sure our voice will be heard," Gissin said. "But we've proved we are usually able to cope with these challenges successfully."

He said that the branding campaign is only one step on a "long road" to burnishing Israel's image in the public eye and that there will always be detractors who seek to spread falsehoods about the Jewish state.

Such people will use any justification to continue their vitriolic smear of Israel, Gissin said.

Using the recent Dead Sea Scrolls exhibit at the Royal Ontario Museum and the protest over the Toronto International Film Festival's showcase of Tel Aviv as examples, Gissin said Israel's detractors can always find an "excuse" to call for boycotts of the country.

"They would have found another reason if these weren't available," he said.

Still, as a result of the branding exercise, "Toronto today is the most important arena where the war of perception [about Israel] is taking place," he said. "We know the debate will continue, and that at any point in time and on any subject, the anti-Israel coalition – unfortunately sometimes spearheaded by Jewish personalities – will continue to work against us."

Now that this chapter in Gissin's consular file is in the past, it's time to move on to other tasks, he said.

One of his main objectives is to establish cross-cultural links between the Canadian Jewish community and other faith or ethnic communities to secure allies for both the local community and Israel.

It's now vital to hasten a mutual, grassroots dialogue between Jews and their neighbours, and in a city such as Toronto, one of the most multicultural places on earth, it makes sense to start promoting Israel wherever and whenever the community can intersect with others, he said.

"The changing reality on Toronto's streets and campuses is that new communities are building their lives here," he said. "You'll find lots of talk about multiculturalism, but little talk about cross-culturalism. In the same way the Jewish community helped build this city financially and socially, it is time for the community to understand it has a leading role in the attempt to bridge cultural gaps and engage in cross-cultural activities."

Jewish Book Fair returns

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

When Toronto's 33rd annual Jewish Book Fair opens next week, it will not be with a hot book and author as in past years. Rather, the opener is Taibele and Her Demon, a musical performance involving klezmer, jazz, spoken-word storytelling and visual interpretation of a story by Isaac Bashevis Singer, featuring a bevy of musicians and compositions by Lorie Wolf.

Along with the requisite books that have always been part of its tradition, the upcoming book fair (Oct. 24 to Nov 1) is also presenting a new play, a movie, and several cooking demonstrations in the culinary arts studios of the revitalized Lipa Green Conference Centre at 4600 Bathurst St. All of these events are tied to books, but books are not necessarily the primary focus any more.

"We just want to freshen the look of the book fair," said director Helen Redner, who in the past 29 years has welcomed the likes of Mordecai Richler, Chaim Potok, Eli Wiesel, Isaac B. Singer and, last year, Alan Dershowitz. But such big names are the exception rather than the rule. "An Alan Dershowitz comes once every 15 years or so," she said.

From Zion, Torah and science

Weizmann Institute scientist Ada Yonath, a leading researcher in the field of structural biology, last week won the Nobel Prize in chemistry. Yonath was only the fourth woman in history to do so. She shared the prize with Britain's Venkatraman Ramakrishnan and American Thomas Steitz.

Yonath has centred her research on the structure of the ribosome, a part of the cell that synthesizes protein and translates genetic code in the production of protein.

She is also the first Israeli biologist to work with NASA in sending research material to outer space. She has worked with NASA on 12 missions. Her research has contributed immensely to the development of more effective antibiotics, helping the medical world counter pathogens that have become drug resistant.

We join in the expressions of congratulations and in the feelings of "enormous pride" conveyed by Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to Prof. Yonath.

"It is an enormous achievement," Netanyahu said of her work.

In truth, however, Yonath's achievement is of a piece with the full run of constantly emerging, astonishing achievements by Israeli science and scientists. Elsewhere in this issue of The CJN, for example, we report on an Israeli company that has developed a method of generating electricity from highway vehicular traffic. Generators implanted in the asphalt will create energy when cars and trucks drive over them. The electrical energy will then be stored in batteries along the side of the road for further distribution.

As well, just recently, Israel21c, an Israeli-based news service, reported on a revolutionary system developed by an Israeli company that closes wounds and stops bleeding by using a form of bonding glue. Israel21c also reported that Israeli "scientists have discovered a new protein partnership that leads to regression in certain pediatric tumours, holding out hope for a new breed of anti-cancer drugs." In addition, the agency highlighted a biomedical engineering firm that has developed "the tiniest medical camera in the world. It measures 0.05 inches in width, is cheap to produce and should eliminate the need for many invasive, costly and risky procedures."

The level and reach of the scientific work emanating from Israel is itself one of the most exciting and dramatic stories of the last 20 years. Yonath is the ninth Nobel Prize winner from tiny Israel.

We have always believed and sang "Ki miTzion tetzeh Torah." ("For out of Zion shall go forth Torah.") Alongside Torah, we might also now add mada (science), although as we know, true science is part and parcel of true Torah. And as with Torah, the science that emanates from Zion is also intended to benefit all humanity.

If only Israel's enemies would cast aside their enmity and their hatred to join with the scientists of the Jewish state in helping to build a better world for their people, too.

Communist East Germany promised PLO leader Yasser Arafat political, diplomatic and material aid for the Palestinians. It also pledged to train PLO fighters in their conflict with Israel.

Prays for Gilad Schalit

Israeli soldier Gilad Schalit was kidnapped by Hamas on June 25, 2006. To this day, I feel a strong connection to our Israeli brother, as this was my 13th birthday. For more than three years, I have prayed that Schalit is alive and healthy, and that he is returned home to Israel as soon as possible.

On Oct. 2, I was elated to find out that God has answered two of my three prayers, thus far. That day, Israel received a video of Schalit from Hamas, in exchange for 20 female Palestinian prisoners ("Palestinian prisoners exchanged for Schalit video, Oct. 8). The video, which was filmed on Sept. 14, features an often-smiling Schalit holding a Arabic-language newspaper from that day. Schalit lets his family know that he is in good health and asks Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to "allow me to fulfil my dream and be released."

It, too, is a dream of mine that Schalit be returned to Israel. Two years ago, as a Grade 9 student, I learned the Jewish law veshavu banim legvulam (Jeremiah 31:16). The literal translation of this passage is, "And thy children shall return to their own border." This law dictates that we as Jews are responsible for any fellow Jew that is held captive. No matter what the cost, we must bring our children back home, dead or alive.

We must pray that Netanyahu reaches an agreement with Hamas in exchange for Schalit. I look forward to the day that he smiles in his home in Israel, instead of in a Hamas jail.

Time to move beyond divisive politics

In his recent letter to the editor, Jerrold Landau vilifies Ontario Premier Dalton McGuinty with respect to his non-support of equality in funding for Jewish Day Schools in Ontario ("Day school funding, Oct. 1). For the record, I, too, support the funding of faith-based education.

While Landau chooses to blame McGuinty, he fails to grasp some fundamental issues. The rejection of the school funding came at the hand of the electorate in the last election. History has also shown that the people of Ontario have little stomach for funding separate schools. One only has to recall the provincial election in 1984. In that election, the divisive issue was former Ontario premier Bill Davis' promise to extend full funding to Catholic schools through Grade 13. The Tories were defeated. Secondly, this issue has been adjudicated by the courts on many occasions.

While funding of Jewish day schools continues to be an important issue to our community, the Tomorrow Campaign of the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto is of equal if not greater importance. The government's commitment of $15 million to this campaign will enable the Jewish community in Toronto to continue to provide programs for the broader Jewish community with services that it will need in order to flourish into the 21st century.

When the premier of Ontario affirms his government's financial support to our community, especially to the tune of $15 million, we as a community should say thank you. It is time to move beyond divisive politics and look out for the greater good of our community.

Job prospects for female rabbis

Rabbi Adam Cutler, who writes of the importance of attracting both Canadian and non-Canadian rabbis to work in Canada (Letters, Sept. 24), and Daniel Held, who wrote the initial column ("Where have the Canadians gone?" Sept. 10), are overlooking a large reason why some Canadian rabbis don't return to Canada for work.

While growing up in Toronto, I met four talented students who became rabbis. I met two while working at the high school branch of the then-Jewish Students' Network. I met the third, a Wexner fellow and Rhodes scholar, at Jewish summer camp and the fourth at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto. I suspect that one of the reasons these rabbis did not return was that as women, their job prospects in Ontario were much more limited than in the United States, where Conservative synagogues hire women as senior pulpit rabbis and it's easier for female rabbis to get jobs in day schools or other educational institutions than it is here.

Palestinians furious as UN delays vote on Goldstone report

By URIEL HEILMAN
JTA

It long has been considered almost axiomatic at the United Nations that there's no real sense for Israel to try to muster opposition to UN resolutions it considers hostile, particularly when those resolutions don't carry the force of law.

The powerful 56-member Arab-Muslim bloc known as the Organization of the Islamic Conference, coupled with the complacency of western governments, has made passage of anti-Israel resolutions in bodies such as the General Assembly and the UN Human Rights Council in Geneva a virtual guarantee.

So supporters of Israel were surprised and pleased when the Geneva-based council elected to delay a vote on endorsing the Goldstone report on the Israel-Hamas war – effectively setting aside a resolution considered negative for Israel – until the council's next session in March.

But the firestorm of controversy it generated among Palestinians almost immediately fuelled a new effort to take the matter directly to the UN Security Council.

Last Wednesday, at the urging of Libya, the Security Council held consultations in New York, to decide whether or not to hold an official emergency session to discuss the Goldstone report. The council ended up rejecting the idea, but it did move up its monthly meeting in October by a week and said the Goldstone report could be discussed then.

Insiders say strong pressure by U.S. and Israeli officials prompted the delay in Geneva, with Israel warning that a vote sending the report to the Security Council would derail Israeli-Palestinian security co-operation and U.S.-sponsored peace negotiations.

"I think the Palestinians got the message that they had to make a choice: either co-operate with Israel, including on the peace process, or pursue a futile political campaign based on the one-sided Goldstone report," said Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch.

Once the Palestinian Authority, which is not a member of the 47-member Human Rights Council, asked to delay the vote, other Arab and Muslim countries followed suit. The Pakistani delegation to the council made the announcement last Friday on behalf of the Muslim bloc, officially citing the need for more time to discuss the Goldstone report.

Advocates for Israel initially took the delay as a hopeful sign that strong pressure by Israel and its allies actually can yield positive results.

"What happened on the Goldstone report suggests, maybe for the first time, that complacency on Israel may have eroded," said Felice Gaer, an expert on UN affairs and the director of the American Jewish Committee's Jacob Blaustein Institute for Human Rights. "It's a phenomenal outcome. I don't believe this has ever happened before."

The move infuriated Palestinians in Gaza and the West Bank. Hundreds of protesters took to the streets in Ramallah, and Hamas officials in Gaza accused Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas of treason. Barraged by the criticism, Abbas denied asking for a delay in the vote and said he would launch an investigation to discover how the delay came about.

Ismail Haniyeh, the Hamas leader and deposed PA prime minister, rejected Abbas' response as dissembling.

"Abbas gave the orders to delay voting on the report," Haniyeh said.

Last week, with the criticism showing no signs of abating, the Palestinian Authority switched gears: on Tuesday, Palestinian negotiator Saeb Erakat told the French news agency AFP that Abbas was considering asking the General Assembly or Security Council to take up the Goldstone recommendations. The next day, Libya put in its request. The move constituted a major breach of UN protocol, since the report officially is still under deliberation at the Human Rights Council, the body that commissioned it.

The Security Council's decision Wednesday not to hold a special session on the Goldstone report makes a vote on the issue at the Security Council's monthly meeting on Oct. 14 highly unlikely.

Posters of Palestinian president Mahmud Abbas with a phrase reading in Arabic, "to the dust bin of history, traitor" are plastered on the streets in Gaza City on Oct. 7, 2009. Hamas warned that controversy over a damning UN report on the Gaza war could affect the Palestinian reconciliation deal which Egypt said was to be signed later this month in Cairo.

A member of Abbas' inner circle last week criticized the PA leader for agreeing to the deferral of the UN Human Rights Council's debate of the Goldstone report. It was the first such criticism of Abbas from a high PA official and came after days of protests in the West Bank and Gaza.

Senior Abbas adviser Yasser Abed Rabbo told the Voice of Palestine radio that the Palestinian leadership had erred.

"What happened is a mistake, but [it] can be repaired," said Abed Rabbo, secretary general of the Palestine Liberation Organization." "We have the courage to admit there was a mistake."

Abbas' aides have defended his decision, saying the Palestinians needed more time to win international support for the UN report. They said deferring action did not mean burying the report. They noted that not only the United States, but also Britain and China opposed the PA's original motion. And since all three have veto power in the Security Council, referral to the Security Council would have accomplished nothing except to antagonize three major powers, he explained.

Several Arab states also urged Abbas to withdraw the motion, after they, too, came under pressure from Washington, he said.

Some analysts believe that the growing criticism of Abbas' UN decision prompted the PA to publicly demand last week that Arab states fight what he termed an Israeli takeover of Jerusalem, even though privately the PA is worried by the possibility of a conflagration in the city.

It was an effort to divert attention from the Goldstone issue.

Even so, Nabil Amr, a leading member of Abbas' Fatah movement who has long been one of his outspoken critics, resigned as the PA's ambassador to Egypt to protest Abbas' decision on the Goldstone report.

The 574-page report by former South African jurist Richard Goldstone, which was released in mid-September, was commissioned amid Israel-Hamas fighting last January. Israel considered the mandate – to probe Israel's "grave violations of human rights" – biased and refused to co-operate.

The report found both Israel and Hamas guilty of "war crimes" and called for the UN Security Council to send the matter to the International Criminal Court if Israel did not launch its own investigation of the alleged war crimes within six months.

The Human Rights Council, a body that has been fixated on Israel since its founding three years ago, with some 80 per cent of resolutions focused on the Jewish state – was expected to vote on a resolution endorsing the Goldstone recommendations.

But that never happened.

Officials at Israel's UN mission in Geneva declined to talk to JTA about Israel's role in the matter, saying they had been instructed specifically by Jerusalem to keep mum on the issue. Some media reports quoted anonymous PA officials as saying they were furious that Israeli officials had told reporters late last week that the Palestinian delegation was behind the delay.

Aside from the Goldstone report itself, which Israeli President Shimon Peres called a "mockery of history," because it did not "distinguish between the aggressor and a state exercising its right for self-defence," the Israeli government has a fundamental problem with being censured for taking action to protect itself against Hamas rocket attacks.

Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu articulated this argument last month in his address to the UN General Assembly. Given that the United Nations was silent when Hamas carried out intense rockets attack fire on Israel following the Israeli withdrawal from Gaza in 2005, censuring Israel for striking back during last January's war against Hamas would destroy Israel's willingness to take risks for peace, Netanyahu said.

"Will you stand with Israel or will you stand with the terrorists?" he told the General Assembly. "If Israel is again asked to take more risks for peace, we must know today that you will stand with us tomorrow. Only if we have the confidence that we can defend ourselves can we take further risks for peace."

Opinions

Love thy neighbour, and the stranger

Loving one's fellow human beings is a challenge.

Even the tiny Jewish people are divided among religious, secular, Reform, Conservative, Orthodox, Sephardi and Ashkenazi groups. Beyond the Jewish people, there are religious conflicts, ethnic rivalries, political rivalries, etc. Division is a fact of life.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

What makes love so difficult? There are two challenges. One is xenophobia, the fear of the stranger. Instinctively, we treat strangers with mistrust. The stranger is viewed as a threat or an inferior, either as someone who may abuse, or someone desirable to abuse, and sometimes, both views are confused. The biblical Egyptians, frightened at the increasing strength of the Jewish population, decide to enslave the despicable, insect-like Jews. Later, the Nazis would describe the Jews as both manipulative, omnipotent creatures and as dirty and despicable vermin. The incoherence of anti-Semitism is irrelevant. Xenophobia stirs up the irrational.

The second challenge to love comes from closeness. Freud used the phrase "the narcissism of small differences" to describe how warring tribes with a great deal of similarity would treat each other with even more enmity than they would total strangers. Those who are similar to us upset us the most, with minor differences stirring bitter criticism and jealousy. That is why in the Book of Genesis, sibling conflict is virulent and frequent. Because they are so close to us, siblings truly inspire the narcissism of small differences.

Most people love some people and ignore the others. Some loyally love those closest to them, but disdain those who are different. Xenophobia gets in the way of authentic love. Others embrace the exotic, but find it difficult to care for their boring and unenlightened kinfolk. Here, the narcissism of small differences gets in the way of universal love. This is why your uncle, who is deeply devoted to community, says despicably racist things at the dinner table, and this is why your cousin volunteers summers in Senegal, but completely ignores the people of Sderot.

The Torah requires that we open our hearts to both kinds of love. It commands us to love the neighbour, the people closest, and most annoying, to us, but it also requires that we love the stranger, the exotic outsider who is suspiciously different. The genius of these parallel commandments is that for some the challenge is to love the stranger, while for others, it's loving neighbours that gets complicated.

But in the end, God commands us to love all 6.6 billion of His children.

And that includes your irritating second cousin and the unusual foreigner on the subway.

Cohen's karma defeats boycotters

In late September, nearly 50,000 Israelis massed into the National Stadium in Ramat Gan to hear the Canadian troubadour Leonard Cohen sing. Not only did the sponsors add an additional 1,000 seats at the last minute, but many in the crowd seemed quite familiar with Cohen's oeuvre – and not just Hallelujah.

But perhaps most impressive, Cohen's magic worked in the Middle East. After the concert, as thousands streamed into the overflowing parking lots, as people pulled out of their typically Israeli haphazard parking spots – it took us more than 45 minutes to leave the complex – a modern miracle occurred: I didn't hear one shout, one sustained beep, one impatient "Nu kvar...." Cohen's karma proved contagious.

Tragically, most of our Palestinian neighbours weren't exposed to Cohen's charms. The simple fact that he was willing to play a concert in Tel Aviv made Cohen persona non grata in the Palestinian Authority. He had offered to play in Ramallah, too. But as part of the hysterical, misanthropic BDS – boycott, divestment and sanctions – movement targeting Israel, Palestinians spurned his offer. Undeterred, Cohen donated the $2 million the concert generated to a special foundation he established, whose major beneficiary is the Parents Circle, a group of bereaved Israelis and Palestinians who have lost loved ones in the conflict. Cohen repeatedly praised this "holy, holy" group during his transfixing 3-1/4-hour-long concert, each time triggering sustained applause.

With the Palestinians' ridiculous, impotent Cohen ban coming days after the failed attempt to ruin the Toronto International Film Festival (TIFF) because it dared to celebrate Tel Aviv's 100th anniversary, the pro-Palestinian movement seems to be reaching new lows. Palestinians and their fellow travellers are trying to treat Israel as a country with cooties – the schoolyard phrase captures just how immature and self-destructive this move is. As a result, even peace-loving Zen Buddhist monks like Cohen or the many left-leaning, pro-Palestinian Israelis in the Tel Aviv film community are deemed radioactive, because they dare to interact with the Jewish state.
